BY MRS. M. V. VICTOR.

Author of "GOLD HUNTERS," "MAUM GUINEA," etc.

In this fine story we have reproduced, to the life, the Kentucky of the year 1800. It is one of the most exciting and absorbing of stories, embracing such characters and incidents as only Kentucky can produce. Jo Daviess was one of the most remarkable men of that remarkable period. He plays in the novel such a part as only Jo Daviess could play in and out of court. The great charm of Mrs. Victor's works is heightened by the fact that her characters are historically true. In reading her novels we have, besides, real expositions of men and veritable events. This her latest work is one of her best. It will not fail to command a wide sale.

CHAPTER I.

THE GAMING-HOUSE.

WHAT were the thoughts of the somber-looking man, who, muffled in a dark cloak, which shaded his bronzed face, was leaning against a tree in the street Alameda of Mexico, watching the curtained windows of a large mansion, might not be revealed through his compressed lip and lowering eye. That his meditations were not of a quiet cast was evident from a start which at times pervaded his frame, but whether such movement resulted from anger, fear, or impatience, it was difficult to surmise.

Many persons passed the solitary gazer, some leaving or entering the house; and, as often as the great entrance-door fell back upon its hinges, the muffled watcher bent his glance upon the opening, as if to discover some object of search. Numbers on whom his regards fell seemed to be familiars, and returned his look with a glance of recognition, but none stayed to greet him further, either repelled by his gloomy deportment, or undesirous of colloquy.

Thus an hour or more passed on, and the street began to grow lonely, and echoed only fitfully to the quick tread of belated pedestrians, hurrying homeward. The watcher, it was manifest, began to grow restless, and twice or thrice left his position at the tree, to pass and repass the gaming-house, muttering as he did so an expression of impatience. At last, however, while his gaze rested upon the door, as if he were halt in doubt whether it would not be better at once to enter the mansion, a sudden stream of light flashed upon the walk, and the figure of a man descended the heavy stone steps which led to the pavement.

"It is he—it is Falcone!" muttered the muffled observer and he at once crossed the street.

Apparently, however, he had not calculated on the reception which he was to meet from the other, for his form was yet wrapped closely with his mantle, when the new-comer suddenly threw himself roughly forward, and before a movement could be made by the individual assailed, grasped him savagely by the throat, bearing him to the ground.

The muffled man was one not easily thrown off his guard—nevertheless, the present attack was so unexpected, that for a moment he felt himself powerless, while the cold muzzle of a pistol was pressed against his forehead, and an agitated voice muttered hoarsely in his ear:

"Your purse, Señor!"

"Take your hand from my throat and your pistol from my head, and we will consider," was the quiet reply.

"Quick—your purse or you die! I am a desperate man!"

"A ruined gamester—ha, Señor!" cried the assailed. "Come, come, I am your friend, and my purse is yours, Señor Falcone!"

"Ha!" exclaimed the foot-pad, starting and removing his hold, while the other rose to his feet, "you know me?" Then endeavoring to regain the advantage he had resigned, he continued quickly, "but you shall die."

"Not so fast, my very good friend. I know you for a brave man, a reckless gamester, and this time for a gentleman of my own cloth, with whom I shall be pleased to drink a glass of wine to our better acquaintance, Señor Falcone."

"And who, in the fiend's name—"

"At your service, Señor. And now," said the stranger, adjusting his collar with a movement at once self-possessed and graceful, "as you have not blown my brains out so suddenly as appeared to be your design a moment since, allow me to be your banker."

Saying this, he drew a heavy purse from his breast-pocket and tendered it to his late assailant.

"I ask pardon! Many thanks!" returned the latter. "I remain your debtor very gratefully, only asking that I may know to whom I am indebted."

"All in good time. For the present be content, Señor Falcone, not to look a gift-horse in the mouth, as we say in Spain."

"Oho! you are then no Mexican?"

"You are very quick at conclusions, Señor. Well, let us part, for I perceive that you have a mind to empty your purse once more at monté and I have other business on hand. But you will meet me again, Señor?"

"Gladly, if you but say when and where."

"To-morrow, at sunset, in the botanic garden. Be there, and we may become better acquainted."

"I shall not fail," answered the gambler, warmly grasping the hand which was extended to him, and then turning toward the threshold of the gaming-house, from which he had so recently rushed forth, a despairing bankrupt.

But at this moment, the jalousied door of the mansion was dashed violently open, and a young man, whose countenance appeared ghastly pale, staggered down the steps.

"Another victim!" cried the stranger with a laugh. "But luckily I have not another purse."

Falcone uttered a cry, as his eyes fell upon the new-come. He darted quickly forward, and had half ascended the wide stone steps, when a sharp, ringing report broke the night's stillness, a bright flash illumined for a moment the street, and a dull sound echoed upon the pavement. The body of a dead man rolled down the steps.

"Shot himself!" cried Falcone, with an oath.

"Another victim to monté!" muttered the other personage; and then, as the noise of hurrying feet approached, he seized the arm of his new acquaintance, and hurried him from the spot.

"Come with me—monté is ended for the night."

Why should it not be? It had made a robber and a suicide in the short space of ten minutes.

CHAPTER II

THE SUICIDE'S HOME.

AMONG the variously attired and odd-looking persons attracted toward the gaming-house in the street Alameda, by the sudden report of a pistol-shot, one might have been noticed whose exterior presented certainly as strange an appearance as did that of any.

This individual was appareled in garments which seemed to have derived their origin in divers parts of creation, albeit noticeable neither for elegance nor costliness. A broad-brimmed palm-leaf hat slouched over his countenance, with a swaggering sort of air, and a brownish-white linen coat, lamentably tattered, draggled from his shoulders. Tight-fitting breeches of yellow nankeen cotton, with parti-colored woolen stockings of Mexican amplitude drawn over them, completed his singular attire, and he marched with as careless a step as if he trod on land that had belonged to his ancestors, since the days of the Conquistador.

But no one who glanced twice at this person (and there were many who did so,) could have been so far deceived as to fancy him a Mexican; for there was an expression about his actions and manner that stamped him unmistakably as a native of that region whose ambitious representatives are found wherever wind blows or light penetrates, but whose actual localities are embraced in a radius of five hundred miles around Bunker Hill monument.

It was our old friend and adventurer Putnam Pomfret, the "Knight-Errant" portion of whose history we have narrated in connection with the story of the Peon Prince.

Borne along in the crowd that pressed forward to the spot where, rigid in the embrace of death, the poor suicide lay in a pool of his own blood, Pomfret reached the gaming-house. The confused noise of exclamations and hurrying feet, lights flashing over many-colored garments, presented a scene both novel and striking to the stranger, and, pushing lustily forward to gain a position from which he could behold the cause of excitement, he soon found himself close to the balustraded steps, and directly opposite the body of monté's victim.

The dead gambler lay upon his face, his garments saturated with the crimson flood that dyed the pavement, streaming from his shattered forehead; and as one of the crowd stooped and raised his inanimate form, the light of a torch flashed upon his face. Putnam Pomfret bent forward, and saw that it was no Mexican countenance.

Blue eyes, clouded with the film of death, and a fair complexion, slightly shaded by deep masses of flaxen hair, proclaimed at once that the suicide was of Saxon origin. One hand still clutched the instrument of self-murder, and the other was pressed tightly to the cold bosom. Pomfret advanced, and stooping beside the body, loosened the rigid gripe of the closed fingers.

A locket of gold was held firmly between those fingers, as if clasped in the last spasm. The hand, as the Yankee lifted it, seemed to cling tenaciously to the treasured token—a miniature, upon the golden back of which, by the light of a torch, Pomfret beheld inscribed a single line, and that revealed a history:

"To my brother. New Orleans, July 1, 1845."

"He is my countryman!" cried the Yankee, raising the mangled head of the suicide from the pavement, and looking round upon the group of dark-eyed Mexicans, who at once comprehended the feeling which led to the action. Three or four of them immediately stooped beside the body, and raising it gently in their arms, prepared to assist in bearing it to the dead-house.

In Mexico the occurrence of a suicide or assassination is not so rare an event as to create much consternation or wonder. Indeed, save in peculiar instances, a catastrophe like this may take place without seriously breaking in upon the usual routine of business or amusement. Consequently, though the suddenness of the young man's death, and the obviousness of ill-luck at play being its occasion, afforded some food for speculation and discussion among the lookers-on, there is little doubt that Putnam Pomfret was the only breast that throbbed with sincere regret. Only the humble Yankee felt that in the cold weight he was aiding to sustain, was once enshrined a living and immortal spirit. Only he really sorrowed, for he reflected that the dead man was his countryman, and, like himself, a stranger in a strange land.

The somber procession hurried to the nearest guard-house, there to make the deposition in reference to the finding of the body—for which purpose the inmates of the gambling-house were also summoned. A short examination elicited the brief story of the lost one. He was known to be a young American—a stranger, for some time resident in the capital. What was his name, or what his vocation, could not be so easily learned; but his residence was ascertained from an entry on his tablets, and thither, with Pomfret as its only mourner, the body of the suicide was ordered to be conveyed.

And thus, while the night wore on, and the streets grew silent and deserted, the victim of monté was borne to his home—or the house which had been designated as the late residence of the unhappy young man. It was in a retired quarter of the city, and was a dwelling of modest exterior, standing apart from others in the street. Pomfret knocked at the narrow door, which, after a while, was opened by an old negro, who, beholding a group of men disclosed in the dim light, uttered a hasty exclamation in a language recognized at once by the Yankee as his own.

“Come down here,” said Pomfret, beckoning to the black, who evidently hesitated before descending the few stone steps.

But at this moment, the clouds which, during the evening, had overspread the sky, were parted by the full moon, and a stream of light suddenly fell upon the face and figure of the corpse. The negro saw it, and uttering a shrill cry of terror, rushed down from the threshold. He paused a moment with a stupefied air, gazing upon the blood-stained burden which had been deposited by its rude bearers upon the flagging, and then, with a long wail, threw himself upon his knees beside it.

“Oh, massa! massa Charley! Oh Lord! Massa is dead—dead!” cried the black, clasping his arms around the body, and rocking his own frame to and fro. “Oh, my dear massa Charley is murdered!”

"Who was your master?" asked Pomfret, in a low voice.

But the negro seemed to have no thought of aught save the fearful spectacle before him. He moaned and essayed to lift the body in his arms, crying, in agonizing tones:

"Murdered—Massa Charley murdered! Oh, what shall I do? Massa's done gone!"

At length Pomfret succeeded in arresting his attention, and sought a reply to his question, which the negro endeavored to afford, though his words were so broken by sobs as to be scarcely intelligible. And before, indeed, any definite information could be elicited from the agitated slave, for such he apparently was, a new incident added interest to the scene.

The door of the house had been left open by the black, in his hurried movement on recognizing the body of his master; and now, as the old servant renewed his lamentations, a rush was heard through the interior of the hall, and a large dog of the Newfoundland breed bounded over the threshold, down the steps, and with a loud bark, leaped upon the breast of the suicide. The Mexicans standing near shrieked and fled away, conceiving, in their superstitious fear, that it was no mortal thing they beheld; and the animal, placing his fore paws upon the bosom of the corpse, raised his head, and gave utterance to a prolonged and dismal howl.

It was a fearful sight. Stretched upon the pavement lay the unfortunate suicide, his garments saturated with blood, his features ghastly and rigid, upturned in the moonlight. Kneeling beside, wildly tearing his grizzled locks in the vehemence of his sorrow, was the old negro, sounding his monotonous, wailing cry. And, erect upon the corpse, his head thrown back, and the frightful howl proceeding incessantly from his massy throat, appeared the dog that had recognized the presence of death. Pomfret, though stout-hearted, could not look unmoved on such a scene. He dashed his hand across his eyes, and turned toward the door, but started suddenly at the presence he beheld.

A maiden stood upon the threshold. Clad in a white robe, with one small hand pressed upon her bosom, and the other holding a taper which cast its trembling rays upon the group below, she stood as if paralyzed—her gaze centered upon the suicide's form. It was apparent that she could not at once realize the entire horror of the spectacle, for her heart seemed scarcely to pulsate, her eyes were meaningless. But, presently, as if forced from her by an inward spasm, her voice broke upon the night-air in a cry so agonizing that it was like a dagger-stroke upon the bosom of those who heard it. Then, with a bound, the maiden reached the corpse and sank insensible beside it, her pallid cheek resting upon the cold brow of the dead.

And there they lay together—brother and sister; a sight that might touch the heart of savages, while the negro servant swayed back and forth above them, with clasped hands, murmuring his broken exclamations, and the dog howled in unison the requiem of his slain master.

When Falcone, the gambler, was hurried away by the new-formed and mysterious acquaintance whom he had attempted to rob, the young man presented, under the dim moonlight that struggled through masses of gray clouds, an appearance denoting great internal emotion. His face was ashy white, and his limbs trembled as they obeyed the impulses which hurried him along.

"What, comrade, you are not frightened, are you, that your limbs are so loose?" said the stranger. "Thank your good stars, Señor, that 'tis not your own body, instead of another man's, that is now lying stark before you grinning death!"

"Dead!—dead!—Oh, horrible! I looked not for death!" murmured Falcone, lifting his hands to his eyes, as if to shut out the memory of the scene he had beheld.

"What troubles you, Señor Falcone?" demanded his companion, essaying to steady the gambler, whose frame began to and fro, as he walked.

"I swear by all the saints it was not my work," exclaimed the other, wildly—"twas his own act! I killed him not!"

The night had been one of delirium to this wretched youth. At the gaming-table, where he had staked and lost his last dollar, he had also drunk deeply, and this, combined with the frenzy of play, and the strange excitement which he had experienced, now operating with fearful power upon his senses, led to excess, and presently to weakness, every mental faculty. Meantime, the stranger, who appeared desirous of controlling him for some ulterior purpose, watched the struggle between reason and madness, until the gambler became nearly imbecile, and then, clasping his arm, whispered:

"My friend, the street is not our best bedchamber. Come with me, Gabriel Falcone!"

The young man's eyelids quivered, and he tried to speak, but the effort only shaped some incoherent words. Then his companion bent down, and, embracing him with a vigorous arm, half drew and half lifted him rapidly through the now silent and deserted streets.

After traversing several squares, this singular guide passed before an antiquated, substantial house, standing back from the walk, and almost hidden by large trees. The doorway of this mansion was open, and a shaded lamp burned in a recess of its hall, where, likewise, was an ornate stand, with a small bell upon it, which Falcone's conductor rung briskly, summoning therewith a bronze-headed servant from a coach near by.

"Domino! have a bed made ready for this gentleman!" was the abrupt command of the new-comer, who was evidently the master of the ancient house.

The servant disappeared without speaking, while his master placed Falcone on the coach, and seated himself beside him. The gambler had sunk into a drunken stupor, and his new companion peered his face intently by the light of the solitary lamp in the hall. That face was no longer distorted as when under the influence of his proxy in the street. Only a stolid blankness was now apparent, indicating the degradation of sensibility by intoxication. The head drooped on the shoulders, the eyes were closed, and a relaxation of every limb showed an utter prostration of energy. In a few moments the servant returned, and, with his master's assistance, conveyed Falcone to an inner apartment, where he was laid on a comfortable bed. Then, as the lackey retired, and the gambler's stertorous breathing gave assurance that he was wrapped in dull slumber, the strange master of the house turned his arms across his breast, and looked down on his unconscious guest with a smile of malignant import.

"Gabriel Falcone!" he murmured, a darker shadow flitting over his dark face, while his companion lay motionless and cold, "Gabriel Falcone! I have long sought, and now have you! Your mother, Gabriel, incurred a debt to me, and I forget not—neither forgive. Therefore, Gabriel Faleme, I shall claim full quittance from you, before we part!”

Thus the man muttered, an evil smile on his lip; and then, with another look at the gambler's apathetic face, he left him to his slumbers.

CHAPTER III.

THE GOOD MAN'S CLOSING SCENE.

DURING the same hours of night in which were transpiring the scenes already known to our readers, the common tragedy of death was transpiring in many streets of Mexico. In fact, what day or night, what hour or minute, is free from visitation of that dread guest whom all must some time entertain? Whether he come robed in crimson garments of war, or yellow drapery of pestilence—whether he breathe idly upon Beauty's cheek, or stifle Age with his nightmare embrace, still, death is omnipresent. He enters and departs as he lists, and no man knows when he shall knock at the door of his heart.

But in the passage of a good spirit from earthly habitation, there is no reality of gloom. The wounded journeyer upon earth, whose life has reached its natural term, feels not, if fit to die, a bitterness in the cup he must drink. The overburdened child of sorrow can not help but welcome the wings which are to sustain him in all future journeyings.

So, then, there was no anguish in the parting of a good man, Don Tadeo, who lay trembling on the threshold of two worlds at the hour of midnight—an aged man, with broad and scarcely-wrinkled brow, over which curled a few locks of silvery hair—an old man, with bright and quiet eyes, whose glance shone the assurance of blessed immortality. One of his thin hands clasped that sacred volume which is the rock of a Christian's faith—the other rested on the breast of a youth who knelt beside the bed with wet cheeks and parted lips.

“Weep not, Alonzo!” murmured the dying man. “You have life before you, and I only depart into another life. Calmly do I go, for I know that goodness remains in the heart of him whom I have cherished as the child of my age. Perhaps, my son, as we have sometimes conjectured, the spirits of the departed are permitted to watch over the friends of their earthly love. Surely, if that be so, my joy must be enhanced in contemplating my Alonzo's virtue and happiness."

"Oh! my uncle! my benefactor! my more than father. My God, grant me strength in this hour of trial."

"Be assured that he will, Alonzo. Our parting is only for a season, dear son," said the old man. "Have we not read together," he continued, reverently lifting the Bible to his lips, "not alone the sublime truths of this sacred volume, but the magnificent testimony of that other great book which is unrolled to reason's eye in all the universe of matter? Have we not explored the mysteries of celestial creation and looked upon nature in her manifold moods? And shall we have walked together in the busy pathways of progression, only to be parted now, with no hope of eternal reunion? No, Alonzo, we shall ascend in company the heights of superior knowledge—knowing and worshipping at still purer altars, and receiving into our existence the light of wisdom from its fountain-head."

The aged man's eyes beamed with beautiful confidence. A moisture suffused them, adding tenderness to their expression. His pale cheeks flushed with holy enthusiasm, and pressing the book of God to his heart, he smiled with serene joy.

It need not, indeed, the formal logic of religion and philosophy to enable the young man to await with resignation the hour of parting from one so dear to him as this old man. Lina's explanation in infancy, the child had found a father, the youth discovered a wife's friend, in the only brother of his mother. Don Tadeo, disappointed in early life by the death of one to whom he had been betrothed, would never break the union tie that linked her memory with his heart's only hope. He had chosen a model life, surrounding himself with books, and devoting his days to two objects, the practice of active benevolence, and the pursuit of knowledge in all her arduous paths. Not wealthy, Don Tadeo possessed enough for his own wants and sufficient to share largely with the needy around him. His years, from the age of thirty, had been spent amid the wild scenery of Upper Mexico—among snow-capped hills, and ample forests, where he breathed the untainted breeze of la tierra fria. He lived almost a hermit's life until the death of his sister left the child Alonzo to his care. The orphan gained a kind protector and a happy home, and the bachelor guardian henceforth found an object for his affection, and a docile pupil on whom to lavish all the stores of his varied learning. The orphan's childhood and youth passed like a pleasant romance in the retreat of his mountain dwelling-place, and it was only during the last year of his uncle's life that he had been a resident of the capital. Up to this period he had dwelt amid nature's beauties, her chosen child, yet imbued with all the misty lore of older art. Wandering among solemn woods, meandering still rivers, or climbing rocky highlands, with bow bent to the fresh mountain breeze, he had drunk deep draughts of romance, mingling the past with the present. His was an existence of quiet, unbroken by the world's tumult—a seclusion veiled by clouds.

But of late years, the youth's heart had thrilled with infinite longings for something yet unknown. The tedious monotony of his studies, his walks and reveries, grew tedious and unsatisfying. He felt within him the promptings of some unknown power, ever and anon uplifting a corner of the curtain which enveloped his dreaming soul, and revealing the glimmerings of a future yet unborn.

And for such an idealistic being destiny was weaving the chains of reality. The hours were slowly bringing to the youth's conception a new thought—a new experience. That awful idea which was first revealed to mankind's striated progenitors, the full extent of the Eternal's judgment upon their disobedience—that immeasurably awful idea which lay like the curse of death—was now about to stir the troubled waters of Alonzo's enthusiast soul.

The solemn moments lingered, yet passed quickly enough, for they brought nearer and nearer the day when he would see Don Tello. Alonzo's young heart was throbbing with the anticipation of his grandfather's return, and the joy of his presence, but it • sprung from the deep and abiding affection which he entertained toward his noble uncle.

Don Talco had remained silent for some moments, his lips moving in quiet prayer, and his eyes glowing with sublime confidence in the mercy of that Being in whose presence he was soon to enter. At length, however, the uncle spoke in a low voice.

"Dear Alonzo, before I depart, I have a brief history to relate, which has ever till now been locked within my own bosom. The tomb closes all earthly memories, and I thought to have borne to my grave the reminiscences of sorrow and disappointment which made my youth a desert till Heaven vouchsafed a boon and blessing in giving to me my Alonzo. But now I feel a desire in my heart, urging me to recall the story of my youth, and perhaps, in its recital, you, my boy, may at once learn all that your uncle has ever concealed from you, and gather from the story some knowledge of the strange world on which you are about to enter. Listen!—but first, dear Alonzo, reach to me yonder ebony casket."

The young man arose from his kneeling posture, and proceeding to a bookcase, brought from one of its shelves a small box, of curiously carved ebony, which he knew to be much prized by his uncle. Don Talco unlocked this casket, and covering his forehead for a few moments, he remained in thought, as if reviving past recollections. Then he took the young man's hand, and began his narration:

"My Alonzo—you behold tears in these aged eyes; you feel my heart beat wildly, even with falling pulses. Judge, then, Alonzo, what must have been the strength of that passion which, through all the lapse of years, has yet clung to this frail heart! Judge how I loved, who, never possessing, have always adored the object of my boyhood's first affection. She was another's, and I learned that she was unhappy—that she was that too common sacrifice to pride and ambition that a bride bore to a throne child of by parents without her own consent. Her husband, older than herself by some score of years, was not a man to win or keep the love of such a woman. Proud, cunning, unscrupulous, he had passed his youth in dissipation, indulging every passion to its utmost limit; and even after his disputes with the beautiful being he had literally bought (for his wealth was enormous) he neither refrained from nor concealed the excesses to which he had become habituated.

"I learned the history of his husband and wife, not at once, but at intervals, by degrees: not from Donna Maria's lips, though afterward her heart was opened to me like a sister's; but by observation and the remarks of others, who little suspected my own absorbing interest. At my first meeting with the lovely but unhappy lady, she had been married only a year, and an infant reposed on her tender bosom. How I struggled under control the passion which immediately took possession of me; how I afterward refrained from divulging it to Maria when I soon after became a constant visitor at her husband's house and was thrown daily in her company; how I concealed, as a miser does his gold, all manifestation of the fire which was consuming my very existence—He alone knows, who overlooks all things, and who in mercy directed this painful subdue mine.

"But when a man could not love, I still discovered it, and for months my life was day and night. In the waking of delirium the image of my beloved was ever present to me, and when, at length, a cruel bodily frame forced me to the distance which had precluded it, and I awoke again to reason, and the hope of life, my first collected thought dawned around the memory of her who was not and never could be mine. Her name was the first word that trembled on my lips, and then I learned the destiny of my life—to live in loneliness!"

Don Tebo pained in his neck, overcome by poignant recollections. Alonso's face expressed the deep interest which the marvellous story excited in his young heart.

"Maria," resumed the old man, remembering his own, though his voice, as he went on, became more and more feeble—"Maria was to me and to her husband but a stranger! During those few months when I lay between life and death, a fearful drama had been enacted—and the driving winds to which I retreated and hiddest myself! My beloved Maria had deserted her husband—had, as I repeat the word, with one of his treacherous companions, having taken and child to them, laid all upon the great volcano of which she, poor child, knew nothing. The threshold! The villain suspected to have enticed her, was a young libertine, of fortune equal to that of her husband, and of a character much like his. But this man, soon after the disappearance of my beloved, had returned to his old haunts, and, when called to account by Maria's husband, denied all knowledge of the woman, and swore that he was not responsible for her absence. His statement, however, was generally disbelieved, inasmuch as circumstances conspired to fix complicity on him; and so bad was his reputation that many scrupled not to suspect him of having added a darker crime to that of abduction. Maria's husband, indifferent as he was, roused himself at this point, fought with his false friend and dangerously wounded him. The authorities took up the matter, but after close examination, no positive evidence was elicited in spite of the popular sentiment, and the libertine, recovering from his almost fatal wound, soon after left Mexico for foreign parts."

Again Don Tadeo hid his face with his transparent fingers; and Alonzo, though deeply interested, implored his uncle to refrain from dwelling to memory events so harrowing to his soul. But Don Tadeo shook his head, and proceeded with his story:

"When I recovered so far as to be able to go out, I learned another act in the wretched tragedy. Maria's husband, tormented with chagrin at the flight of his wife, and perhaps conscious that his own worthless character had been the occasion of it, gave himself up from the time of his deed to a course of reckless dissipation which speedily brought him to the gates of death. At the period when these details were communicated to me, the miserable man was raving under the horrors of delirium tremens, from which madly he never recovered."

Don Tadeo ended his narrative, and, taking the lid of the little casket that had remained on the bed beside him, he took from it a golden locket, the spring of which he pressed, and disclosed the miniature likeness of a beautiful woman.

"This was the shadow of my Maria," murmured Don Tadeo, "and I give it into your keeping as the most sacred memento of your poor uncle, who, loving the dear original, during his lonely life, now welcomes the approach of death, in the sweet hope of reunion with her angelic spirit in that land where we 'shall see no longer through a glass, darkly, but face to face?'"

With these words Don Tadeo pressed the portrait to his lips, kissing it softly, while bright tears rolled slowly down his aged cheeks. Replacing the locket in its case with his own trembling hand, he fell gently back on the pillow, then, with a sigh so low that it seemed but a natural inspiration, the good man's spirit passed to another home—to calm and quiet was the transition; and perhaps Don Tadeo already clasped the hand of his immortal beloved, awaiting him without, ere yet his mortal friend had ceased to move upon his dying words, so full of tenderest hope.

CHAPTER IV

THE YANKEE.

PUTNAM POMFRET, as he sat by an open window, looking forth into the gray dawning of a Mexican day, exhibited very little of that self-assured and reckless expression which is supposed to characterize the North American Stranger in foreign lands. In truth, he had passed a night of anxiety and unrest, for it had been his sorrowful task to watch beside the corpse of that unfortunate countryman, whose rash heart had dared to break the temple of his own despotic soul and hurl the naked and shivering spirit into the dread presence of an Almighty Judge.

Through the still hours of night, when the officers of police, and the curious Mexicans who were attracted thither, had retired to their various homes, Pomfret remained in the house of death, solemnly impressed with the duty required of his hands by the claim which he recognized as sacred above all things—the kindest of country recalled in a stranger's hand. Happily, however, he was spared the witness of another's sorrow—a sorrow that brooked no sympathy, admitted of no solace—the sorrow of that young and lovely being, the sister of the lost young man. In that dreadful moment, when, at the sight of her brother's mangled form, the reason of the maiden yielded to the blow, and with a frenzied cry, she sunk to the bed—in that moment a deep insensibility overwhelmed her, and she fell into a stupor that happily continued for the night. The old negro, assisted by a female servant, conveyed his unconscious mistress to her chamber, and then returned to aid in the disposition of his master's remains. And when the body, lifted from the pavement into an apartment of the house, was laid upon the couch which had been the young man's bed when living, the faithful black resumed his kneeling posture beside it, and shared with the mourning dog the wretched vigils of the night. Penfold, after giving his name and residence to an official, in order that he might be called if required to undergo any further examination concerning the suicide, was allowed to remain in the house of his late countryman, and when all had departed, he took his position in an antechamber adjoining the apartment in which the corpse was deposited, and there awaited, with sleepless eyes, the coming of another morn.

"Let me see," soliloquized the Yankee, crossing his legs, as he settled himself in the wide arm chair which he had been occupying, and from which he could view the open door of another room—the one in which the corpse lay, attended by the faithful negro, and the noble dog and dog—'Let me see,' he repeated, placing the fore-finger of his right hand against his forehead, and then bringing it across the palm of his left, as if to probe and stir his memory of what he desired to recall—"I was coming from the party's house, at twelve o'clock, and making short tracks for Bolgin's, when this ere poor chap, this turn-out fad—I mean this ere poor cipher that's in yonder room, fired his lamp-bell into his own head—so far, that's correct; I'll swear to it before any of the Mexican police folk—letted Sambo, what's wanted?"

This question was addressed to the negro servant of the deceased, who had entered the antechamber unperceived, and now stood beside Penfold's chair. The appearance of the black showed that he had passed a weary and painful night; his eyes were bloodshot and swollen, and the jet of his forehead was marked gray and shiny in the light of early dawn.

Putnam Pomfret could not but be impressed with pity for the evident anguish of the servant, visible in every lineament of his aged countenance.

"De gemman is 'Merican—is de gemman?" asked the negro, as he looked beseechingly at Pomfret.

"Yes, and no mistake—American to the back bone, poor critter!" returned the Yankee. "And I calculate your poor master was a little too much so, too, for these poor heathen Mexikins. Jerusalem! if a chap don't know their tricks, the p'isonest serpents ain't wuns to get along with."

"Massa was murdered; he nobber kill hisself," said the black, solemnly.

"There you're rayther too fast," replied Pomfret, "spec's how I was one of the fast that saw him, just as he lay, with the pistol in his hand. No, poor critter, I hadn't any doubt you love your massa, but depend on't, he shot himself with his own individual hand, and no mistake."

"Massa nobber kill hisself," repeated the negro, shaking his head.

"What on airth do ye mean, critter?" asked the Yankee, somewhat nonplussed at the pertinacity with which the old servant persisted, as he thought, in doubling the fact of his master's self-destruction. "What ar' ye drivin' at, with that 'ere word of yours? Don't ye believe a fellow, when he tells you jest what he has seen, and nothin' else?"

"De gemman 'll please 'em de ole nigger," answered the servant, in a deprecating tone. "But de gemman nobber know'd Massa Charley. Massa Charley, he's Missus him, hehn't de heart to kill a chicken, much less himself, let alone poor missy's heart, and I have all de family to grudge an' sorrow forebbermore. Oh, gorra me, what'll poor missy do? I'm afraid she'll nobber live to see de ole plantation. 'Spec's they'll murder missy and de ole nigger jes' as dey kill poor Massa Charley. Oh, gorra!"

"But I tell ye, your Massa Charley won't murder no one."

"'Spec's you tink so, sar, but you he'n't knowed no all de circumstances. Berry like, Massa Charley loads de pistol in his own hand an' pull de trigger. But who load de pistol, sar? Who stan' behind Massa Charley an' say 'shoot'—shoot you'self, Massa Charles Ginton?"

The negro, as he hurriedly uttered these words, fixed his eyes upon Pondret with a glance which at once satisfied the latter that a rare intelligence was concealed under the old slave's sooty skin. He divined, also, that a mystery rested behind the apparent natural result of suicide consequent upon a ruined gambler's despair of retrieving his fortunes, and the few sentences of the negro made him suspect that some malign influence had been exerted upon the unfortunate young American, leading him to the course of life which had ended so fatally. The Yankee, therefore, with a tact which was natural to him, prepared to glean from the black whatever might be of importance in his instantly conceived design to investigate the causes which had resulted in such a catastrophe to a fellow-countryman.

It was no idle curiosity that prompted this resolution upon the part of Purnam Pondret; for, besides that his earnest sympathy had been aroused by the fate of the youngophile being an American, he had learned enough through the incoherent exclamations of the negro and female attendant on the previous night, to be aware that the scholar's sister was left alone and unprotected in the foreign city, a position which, to the Yankee's mind, gave her at once a claim to all the sympathy and assistance he could render her; for Pondret remembered a cherry-checked sister of his own in their far-off New England home-stead, and he resolved, like a true-hearted American as he was, to hold himself ready for night that might be necessary in the defence and protection of his fair young countrywoman.

With this motive alone, he began to consider the best method of learning the position of the family with whom he had become acquainted so suddenly, in order that he might use the information to their immediate advantage, if necessary. But he was prevented from at once questioning the old servant by the sudden entrance of the female attendant, who had passed the night with her young mistress. Her appearance at once threw the negro into a state of increased agitation; he clasped his hands together and turned forward to meet her, exclaiming:

"Oh, Lucille, what's the matter? What you have do you tell me?—Gone, Lucille, my heart is just like to break in pieces."

"Hush, tongue, Hannibal. Mallemoiselle is to have sleep, it must be she is not disturbed. Oh, ciel! What a night I have spent! Quel horreur! Oh! poor Monsieur Charles! Zey have slain—zey have killed him dead, and we are all lost—perdus!"

Lucille, a lively-looking young melatto girl, with a truly French air of coquetry about her, seemed utterly broken down in contemplation of the sad event which had taken place. She wiped the tears incessantly from her pretty eyes with a corner of her embroidered apron, and continued her vehement exclamations:

"Oh, ciel! what shall we do? Man's he will die! All is lost!"

Pomfret for some moments remained silent, not knowing how to check the passionate grief of both negro and melatto, who evidently grew more excited in witnessing each other's perturbation. At length, however, the Yankee ventured to address Lucille.

"It's a mighty dreadful case, and no mistake," he began, "and calls for a sight o' philosophy and plain facts, and common sense into the bargain. Here's a young gentleman, a real fine, free-hearted American gentleman, from New Orleans—c'annot a stranger in this here Southern town, and a 'tarnal sight too good to walk its streets—that's Master Charles Ginton I'm talking 'bout, ye see, don't ye, Hannibal? Don't ye, Miss Lucille?"

"Oh, gorra!" ejaculated the negro. "An' such a noble gentleman led away, an' cheated out of his money and his life. Oh, gorra!"

"And by a villain—Oh, ciel! What is his name? Hannibal, tell us that—so fly away from, every day when he comes. Ah! he is traitor. He is ze cause of all."

"Mister Charles trusted his friend too much, I reckon," said Pomfret, suggestively.

"I tink Massa Falcone no frien' at all," replied the negro Hannibal. "What for you call him frien' of Massa Charles? Gorra! good frien' no make him drink de champagne, an' he rave like de mad. De good frien' no say, 'Charles, Charles Ginton, come to de gran' school, where dey play de game. No, no, Massa Falcone is no frien'—he is de cause of all."

shoot himself—all for spite o' missy. Eh, Lucille—don't you t'ink dat am de reason?"

"Verment!—c'est comme ça. I have not one doubt. Mam'selle can't bear ze sight of Monsieur Falcone. She drive him away, twice, many times away; Mam'selle about—about ze chamber, when Monsieur Falcone come."

"And Mister Charles did not like that, did he?" asked the Yankee.

"Not much. He was—what you call triste—he was. Monsieur Falcone was triste—triste. Truly, I believe, he think him one brother; oh, Hannibal?"

"Oh, poor man! dat Massa Falcone fool him all de time?"

"And so when mam'selle refuse—he say she will not see ze Spanish man, zen Monsieur Charles and Monsieur Falcone drink together, once, twenty time; and Monsieur Charles become—oh, ça!—what you call tipple—drunk; and zen mam'selle weep so much, implore her brother zat he will no more drink ze champagne, and zat he will return with us all to New Orleans; and Monsieur Charles promise—oui, d'accord—to do all zat mam'selle desire."

"Poor fellow, he could not keep his promise," said Penfield.

"He could not keep him, when Monsieur Falcone come again. They drink ze wine, they drink at mam'selle's bar. Monsieur Falcone swear he will take good care of his friend Charles—and so—Voilà! What good care he has taken! Voilà!"

The mother, saying this, pointed to the open door of the apartment wherein lay the body of her late master, and then, dropping into a torrent of tears, covered her face with her apron and sat down on a low stool beside the negro Hannibal, who looked every inch the utter fool. Penfield needed no more to elicit from him an explanation of all the circumstances connected with the death of Charles Ginton. He saw that some false friend had exerted a pernicious influence over the destiny of the young American, and though he knew nothing of the character or position of the Falcone to whom both Lucille and Hannibal appeared to attribute their misfortune, he could not help feeling that some nefarious scheme had conspired to Ginton's run. The fact of the sister's dislike to her brother's friend, her tender solicitude, and the manner in which its influence had been counteracted, satisfied Pomfret that his countryman had been led on, step by step, to indulge in dissipation and play, until, ripened for destruction, he had fallen a victim to his own desperation, urged on, doubtless, through the evil counsel of his false friend. When this conviction settled itself in the Yankee's mind he resolved at once to pursue such measures as would at least preserve the daughter from any peril that might arise from her unprotected situation. Pomfret's resolves never waited long before being put in execution; so, rising from the arm-chair where he had passed the night, he enjoined upon both servants the necessity of preserving strict watch of the house, and above all things of permitting their mistress to sleep as long as possible.

"For," said he, as he rubbed his moist eyes with a common mankerchief, "the poor girl'll have to bear a mighty big load when she wakes, and it'll do no harm if she gets a little strength to help her. So just keep watch of the house, and let your younger mistress sleep as long as she can. I'm going arter some one who kin do ye all more good than I can."

So saying, Pomfret fixed his broad-brimmed hat securely upon the back of his head, and shaking hands with the weeping servants, set out from the house of sorrow, just as daylight was beginning to struggle between the high walls of the ancient houses, or through the branches of old trees which lined the walk over which he briskly proceeded.

And as that humble-looking Yankee, in worn and travel-stained habiliments, hurried through the streets, no Mexican who passed him would have believed in the possibility of such a shabby individual, however good might be his heart, having any practical power to succeed or prevail over his own position. Nor would any Mexican politician or lawyer have credited such a foolish prediction as might have been made at the time—that this plumed Yankee, Pomfret, would himself hoist the flag of his country upon the walls of the proudest palace in Mexico—before many years should pass away. So ridiculous an idea would have been regarded by the meanest beggar of the capital. So, in happy ignorance of what was to come, the Mexicans who passed Pomfret greeted him with a look of contempt or indifference. And the Yankee heeded, as he went, neither grandee nor beggar. He was thinking of the suicide and his desolate young sister.

CHAPTER V.

PADRE HERRERA IN THE HOUSE OF MOURNING.

IN the back room of a single-storied, spallid looking house, or rather hovel, situated on one of the principal streets, and surrounded on every side by imposing palaces, under the shadow of which it seemed to shrink and hide, like a scared beggar-child in some gorgeous cathedral—in the solitary back room of that unpretending hut, sat a man whose age might not be determined by his features, since in their expression was observable that mixture of youthful freshness with the wisdom of mature years, which distinguishes some countenances, to the manifest perplexity of the best physiognomists. Nevertheless, though it was difficult to settle upon the man's exact age, it was not hard to conjecture, by the mingled softness and determination stamped in his every lineament, that the priest, for such his vesture denoted him to be, was neither of a harsh nor common nature. His eyes were bright and penetrating in their gaze, his cheeks ruddy, and his brow thoughtful, but neither deeply marked with wrinkles nor saluted with midnight vigils. The capacity for action as well as reflection was plainly apparent to an observer in both face and figure of the good fisher, who now leaned his head against the wall of the hut, as he sat on a block of wood which answered for a chair, and who, as if in anticipation of his meditation, smoked quietly a cigarette which he had just rolled up.

The smoke of this cigarette, ascending in the confined apartment, overclouded the priest's head with a greyish cloud, which suited very well the dim light that entered the hut through an unglazed aperture in the rear wall. The morning breeze, for the sun had just risen, slightly agitated the wreaths of smoke, and blew aside the stray locks of hair which grew on either side of the padre's tonsure—but otherwise a character of intense quiet and repose was presented within the hovel, in which the occupant seemed to share equally with the place.

But a sudden tap upon the outside of the wooden window-pane, followed by the appearance of a grizzled-looking head at the aperture above mentioned, aroused the good priest from his reverie, and caused him at once to remove his cigarette and to turn his head toward the new-comer. A glance of pleased recognition accompanied the movement, and he said, in a low voice:

"Benedicite, my son! you are stirring early this morning."

"Yes, and I calculate I was stirrin' late last night, padre. And that's the why and wherefore I'm here now. I want your advice, padre, seein's how two heads are better than one, and I want you to come straight along, if you can conveniently, for I'm in a hobble, an' no mistake."

"The saints preserve us, son; you are not in trouble with the police, I trust."

"O nothin' o' that sort, padre. 'Tain't for myself I'm afraid, no how. Put Pomfret can hog his own row, now, I tell ye. But ef you want to save us nice a critter as ever wore calico, from some consarned chap that's been a plannin' ag'in her, and gittin' her brother shot, and a whole lot more ginerally, I reckon now's your time, and no mistake. So, padre, be gin' pardon, suppose we hurry up and down and push along!"

The worthy priest smiled at the Yankee's earnest suggestion, and proceeded to interrogate him further in relation to the object which he had in view.

"There are, I fear me, some dark purposes threatening this poor young lady," said the priest, after listening awhile. "And the Almighty may permit us to be the instruments of deliverance in them. We must learn more from these faithful servants, and if need be, sister, interest some powerful friends."

"I know you kin do just about what you please with Mister Herrera, padre. I'd like to see our old friend Zamora, who's got to be great now, and that 'ere real right-hand chap, Capung Nunez—I'd like to see both on 'em standin' right side o' you this minute. Jehosaphat! them two fellers are the sort o' critters to walk into rascality, an' no mistake."

"The friends you name are noble spirits, and would be of much assistance to us in any crisis. But Montagnone seldom leaves his retired estates in the mountains, and Colonel Nunez, as you know, is with the army. And we may not need them, my son. Perhaps our fears are magnified in regard to your countrywoman. Of that we shall soon learn more. Let us depart at once."

"Padre, I ain't afraid o' any harm while you're about. By the 'tarnal hokey, I know you're clean grit when occasion requires. I only kin I o' hanker arter a sight o' Captin Nunez, because he's a loss, and no mistake. As you say, padre, there's no tellin' whether we shall want any help at all; but let's be moving spry."

The padre at once proceeded to the door of the hut, to join his American friend, passing through the front room of the hovel, and only pausing a moment to speak to an old olive-faced woman, his hostess, who was bustling about. Then unbarring the frail outer door, he emerged into the street, and set off with Pomfret.

The noise and bustle of daily life was beginning to fill the streets along which the two took their way, and on arriving at their destination they found that the officers of the police were busily engaged in making an examination of the premises, interrogating the servants, and with all the airs of authority, placing the seals of official interference upon such cabinets and desks as they deemed the repositories of papers or documents likely to be of importance in the event of further action on the part of the district alcalde. At the appearance of a priest, they bowed respectfully, but continued their search; and Pomfret, as his eyes glanced hurriedly around the apartment, which was the room that he had occupied alone during the night, and contiguous to that in which lay the corpse of Clinton, saw that another was present besides the two weeping servants of the household. This was the sickle's sister.

The maiden's face was pale as marble, and her eyes heavy with a bitter grief. She sat in a large arm-chair near the window, wrapped in a loose white robe, secured about the waist by a blue sash, and clasped upon her bosom by a small golden cross. In her dark-brown hair was twined a wreath of yesterday's roses, drooping and withered now, as if like the sweet child whose brow they had decked. She was indeed but a child to look upon, for scarcely seventeen summers had passed over her, and the light of youth and hope, until this fatal hour, been bright within her, and a clear, laughing, bright and sunny smile more natural to her than sighs or tears. But now, oppressed and bending beneath the weight of her heaviness, with the image of her fleeing brother ever more present in her thoughts, she sat motionless in the great arm-chair, her eyes shaded by her hands, her tresses falling down and disordered upon her neck, and a deep abstractness of sorrow in her whole appearance that showed how perfectly her spirit was crushed, how marvellous was the abyss of her despair.

The priest, as his pitying eye rested upon the young girl, felt at once, with the quickness of a good heart, how vain would be all common modes of solace for the anguish of the bereaved one. He was well read in life's sad lore, and to read the pages of many a book of grief had been his duty often in the past; for the priest's existence had not been dreamed away in cloistered idleness. His experience, gleaned in many lands and among various sects and qualities of men, was narrowed by no arbitrary application, and his charity, expanded by his acquaintance with suffering and calamity, was something more than a mere mantle of conventionalism; it entered into and radiated from his every act and word, so that unconsciously he won the trust of others, and administered consolation because he had first awakened interest.

It was therefore with true delicacy that the good man approached the stricken maiden to tender her the spontaneous sympathy of his soul. While Pomfret turned aside with the chief official, to answer some inquiries regarding the revolutionary addressed to him, the priest softly laid his hand upon the bowed head of the young girl, and said, gently, "Doubtless, I sorrow with thee."

The tone of the priest's voice and the gentle pressure of his hand aroused the maiden from the apparent stupor into which she had fallen. Her own hands dropped slowly from before her eyes, and she lifted her glance to the speaker's face with an expression of such mingled fear and anguish, that it penetrated at once to the priest's heart. But his own look, so mild yet earnest, so full of love and pity, yet withal with such an influence of strength irradiating from it, seemed to arrest the current of the mourner's reflections. She gazed a moment upon the stranger's features, her troubled countenance revealing naught but perplexity and wondering emotion, her eyes tearless, as if the fountains of their grief had been wept to desert dryness, and then, with an inexpressibly touching movement, shook her head in silence, as if in utter abandonment of every hope of consolation.

"Nay, my child—my poor child, I would not see despair in one so young. I know the sorrow which oppresseth thee is stern and difficult to bear. But it is not amid flowers alone that the path of life conducts to heaven. Behold! through chastening trial cometh sweetest mercy; and He who tempers the wind to the shorn that hath been shorn, will tenderly look down on thee, my stricken one."

Blessed tears! what heart would break not, were their precious flow denied? What nature, steeled though haply it may be against all chances of the world's hard field—what self-reliant spirit, proudly mailed in triple panoply of harsh resolve—what soul encased in custom's adamant, but yet will own the healing charm of tears? They are the medicine of desperate grief; they quicken better moods in baser hearts, and melt the rough, unkindly will. But to the good they are like angel-food, that beautifies and strengthens while it fills—the balm of sorrow, that with healing charm overflows the heart, and waters in its mold new germs of living hope.

Such tears, such blessed tears, now softened the sister's heart, rousing upon the latter memory of her brother's death, and clearing it of that blood-stained horror which had well-nigh driven her mad.

In the meantime, Pombo, after satisfactorily replying to all the questions which the Mexican police thought proper to inflict upon his good-nature, received a permit from these worthy officials, authorizing him, as a countryman of the deceased, to take charge of the preparations which might be necessary, both for his funeral and for the protection of such property as he might have possessed. In obtaining this liberty, the Yankee owed much to a paper which he exhibited, signed by the President of the Republic, vouching for his respectability, and for his Excellency's confidence in him, as one who had rendered good service to the commonwealth. Though the sight of this document occasioned some expression of wonderment on the part of the Mexican functionaries, inasmuch as our friend Pomfret's grotesque and careless appearance did not tally well with the character or services which were indicated in its contents, yet, as there was no disputing the authenticity of the paper, the Yankee was elevated at once in the eyes of his examiners as a possessor of no common pretensions—perhaps some grandee of the neighboring republic, on an incognito mission to General Herrera. Consequently, it was with great show of courtesy and respect that Pomfret was invested with authority to bury his countryman; and the Mexicans, in taking their leave, invoked a thousand saints to aid the "noble American" in his disinterested service to the dead.

The Yankee, relieved from the presence of the police, and remarking with gratification the soothing influence which his friend the padre had exerted upon the mourning sister, turned his attention at once to the steps requisite in order to perform the last duties to poor Glimmer's remains. Quietly beckoning to the two servants, he led the way into the inner room.

The suicide's body lay where it had been deposited on the previous night. A mantle concealed all but the limbs' features, which were also hidden by a white cambric handkerchief, bound around the forehead. A dark stain was visible upon this handkerchief, but on one corner might be perceived, inwrought with figures of lace, evidently the work of some graceful female hand, a small scroll of silk, in which were embroidered the same words that Pomfret had read upon the lock of hair upon Glimmer—"To my friends, N. O., 1845." Alas! that the gift of beauty and youth should now be devoted to so sad a use.

Upon the heart of the corpse was a small wooden box, which some pious entreaties among the Mexican people had there laid, perhaps in the hope that it might be consigned to the soul which had been evoked so suddenly to its account.

Pomfret remarked the emblem, but he did not remove it, nor smile at the superstition which had caused it to be placed there: Protestant by education as he was, our American could yet respect the sincerity of another's faith, though he might not himself subscribe to its dogmas. He prepared to make the necessary dispositions for interment, giving directions to the two servants, who appeared to recognize in him a friend on whom they might rely, and in a brief space, the poor victim to a ruinous passion was arrayed in the habiliments of the grave, and stretched upon the last couch which he should press above the green sod that must, sooner or later, be the couch of all.

CHAPTER VI.

THE TWO GAMESTERS AND A GLIMPSE OF THE PAST.

"GABRIEL FALCONE! we must trust each other!"

Those words were spoken by the master of that house to which the gamester had been conducted. A night's sleep had operated to restore the young man's strength, but his nerves still remained under excitement. On opening his eyes, he recognized at his bedside the acquaintance whom he had made so unpropitiously on his own part; and it was in response to his first exclamation that his singular host uttered the words which begin this chapter.

"You would know who I am?" continued the man. "Let me first assure you that your father knew me well!"

"What know you of my father?" demanded Falcone sharply, lifting his bloodshot eyes.

"What the world knows partially," answered the other—"that he trusted a woman and was fooled, as he deserved to be!"

"Do you speak of my mother, sir?"

"Most assuredly, of that lovely sinner!" rejoined the host, with a cynical laugh. "A mother she was, indeed, Gabriel Falcone, who could abandon her infant child, and clope with a lover from her husband's home!"

"What right have you to speak thus of my father's unhappy wife. And for what purpose do you recall her name?"

"I said, Gabriel Falcone, that we must trust each other," replied the other, deliberately. "Listen, then, to what I have to tell you! But, firstly, do me the favor of observing this scar!"

And the speaker, loosing the belt of his dressing-gown and baring his side, disclosed a white, oval scar raised on the darker skin. It was apparently the mark of a bullet wound.

"You see this token of a skillful duellist. You may be proud of it, Falcone, since it was your father who did me the honor of putting a ball within hair's breadth of my heart."

"You are, then, the man who—"

"I am that poor devil of an abominable fellow who had the impudence to incur the jealousy of your good father, for no reason whatever, save that my face was a handsome one, and your mother a woman of taste. In fine, I am Don Rinaldo Ramos, of whom you have heard gossip and fiction since your babyhood, and who now has the pleasure of being very much at your service."

The flippant manner in which this sentence was delivered, did not conceal a certain bitterness of tone which caused Falcone to shudder. The young man's career of dissipation, luxury and dissipation, exultating in his reckless attempts to seduce the man to whom he now listened, had not totally blunted his sensibilities, and the stranger's sinister allusion to his father's affairs aroused a sudden feeling of alarm, which he could not vent.

"I have heard of you, Don Rinaldo Ramos," he exclaimed, "as a villain—a traitorous wretch, who—"

He paused, as if reluctant to complete the sentence, and his parents with their disgrace.

"Go on, Gabriel! Proceed on that path! By my mother's saint!—whoever that lady personage may be—I would not spoil such a eulogy—"

Falcone turned abruptly, and stretching out his arm, seized his coat, which lay upon a chair near the bed. Then, tearing from its pocket the purse of money which he had received the night before from Don Ricardo Ramos, he flung it angrily against his host's bosom.

"There," he muttered, fiercely, "there is your gold—what I had better have wrested, a prize, from your dead body, than received as a gift from your accursed living hand."

"Bravo! Very well done, Gabriel Falcone," remarked the host, with unmoved voice and manner. "I see that, among other accomplishments, you have a truly dramatic way of expressing your sentiments. Allow me to admire you, Gabriel Falcone!"

"It becomes the devil to sneer," muttered Falcone, withling in his belt, and scowling at his colloquist.

"Nay, nay," cried Don Ricardo, suddenly changing to a tone of apparent feeling. "Let us be friends! I was wrong to speak as I did; and now hear me, Falcone, while I declare to you, on my life and soul, that in the wrong done your father, I was guiltless! In this body now," he continued, contracting his forehead, "I carry about the bullet which he lodged in my breast; and I may be pardoned if the constant presence of such a memento makes my language sometimes rough. I never won the favor of your mother! I was the object of her dislike; and when she fled with another to a foreign land, her conduct was as much a mystery to me as to her husband. This, Gabriel Falcone, I swear to you!"

Don Ricardo watched the effect of his address upon the young man, who, weak from his emotions, had fallen back upon the pillow. Receiving no response, he went on:

"I have offered you my friendship in consideration of that which I owe to your father, who, in his injustice to me, deceived himself. And, in truth, Gabriel, how can the abuse inflicted upon my friendship compare with the wrong done to you, an innocent son?"

"What mean you by that?" asked Falcone.

"Simply," rejoined Don Ricardo, "that, whereas you should now be in possession of the entire wealth left by your father, his unjust suspicions of your legitimacy induced him to transfer the bulk of his fortune to a younger branch of the family. Is it not true that your uncle and his sons enjoy vast revenues from the Falcone estates, while you, having squandered a mere money, now stand stripped of every thing—a gentle beggar of the capital?"

Falcone fixed his eyes on Don Ricardo's calm face, with a bewildered stare. Then, striking his forehead with clenched hand, he muttered, in a savage tone, "By the devil! what you say is all true! But how know you that my father disinherited me? Is it not true that the estates in my uncle's possession were left to him by a distant relation?"

"It is as well, my poor Falcone, that you should believe it to be as they say, inasmuch as the will which stripped you might have been vainly contested. Lawyers, instead of croupiers, might have raked in your last dollar!"

"By heaven! I would have torn his ill-gotten wealth from this gray-beard uncle of mine, though my own life were the forfeit."

"You could not have done so," returned the other, drily. "Answer me—How many days have passed since you called on that gray-beard relative, to implore a simple and not enormous loan, and were most cavalierly refused, though the good Don Jorge did not know the money was to be staked at monté, peradventure?"

"Devil!" cried Falcone—"you know that I was refused!"

"The devil ought certainly to know a great deal about your movements, good Gabriel! But I make no claim to omniscience, and shall refer my interest in your affairs to its very natural cause—old friendship for your family?"

Again the man's brow contracted, and his lips withered. But Falcone took no note; else, perhaps, he might not have extended his hand, as he did, saying:

"Parlen me, Don Ricardo—I did you wrong in my anger. If you are disposed to serve me, I neither desire, nor can afford to reject your friendship. There is my hand again."

"And now, as we are friends," said Don Ricardo, "I would serve you. But first, let us, as I said, confide in each other. Tell me, Gabriel, why the death of that gambler has wrought so strangely affected you. Did you know him?"

"Know him?" echoed the young man, with a sudden tremor evident in his voice. "Yes—he was a sort of compañon—that is all."

"A spendthrift, doubtless, and gambler; fair representative of Mexican youth."

"He was no Mexican," rejoined Falcone.

"What! a European?"

"No—an American from New Orleans. Doubtless his name is now well known to all the city—Charles Ginton."

"Ginton!" exclaimed Don Ricardo, with a start.

"Ay—Ginton! Did you know him, that his name strikes you?"

"Doubtless I have met him or his kindred in my wandering life. The name, it is true, awakened vivid reminiscences, which yet may have no connection with this youth. Was he a stranger here?"

"He resided here a few months, and—"

"Well—why do you stop?"

"What do I know of the wretched suicide?" cried Falcone, in a fierce tone, as if he would shake off a fearful recollection. "How many ruined souls have preceded him in the same criminal end? It may be my fate yet," continued the young man, gloomily.

"Well, despair not yet, Gabriel," said Don Ricardo. "I saved you from one crime last night, and perhaps can put you in a way to repair your shattered fortune. For the present, I request that you will remain quiet in this apartment, for you are yet weak and require rest. On the table you see is a bell, by which you may summon your attendant. By eve, I must to bed, you must rest, and till then will leave you to yourself."

With these words, Don Ricardo Rames stepped to the carpet, and taking the purse of money which Falcone had thrown at his feet, deposited it, without further remark, upon a small table near the bedside. Then, with a parting salutation, he retired from the room.

Falcone listened to the departing footsteps of his host with an expression of mingled distrust and satisfaction apparent in his features, though disguised by a smile. He raised himself slightly upon his pillow, and gazing scrutinizingly around the apartment, marked details of familiarity his share with every object within. Grim, old-fashioned, worn-out and apparently decayed, the walls and doors of this apartment appeared to speak with the sinister character of their master, Don Ricardo. A bookcase of black, polished wood stood in one corner, an armchair of the same fabric stood in another nook, and the heavy arm-chairs, a massy couch, half covered by the thick window drapery above it, and the bedstead on which the guest lay, that seemed a relic of the Spanish invasion, all bore token, not more of an antique taste than of a somber disposition in him who possessed and preserved them.

Falcone noticed every thing in a brief glance, and then, smiling bitterly, muttered, as he fell back upon his pillow:

"This man was my father's friend and enemy, so all report has vouched. Whether his friendship for me be worth my preserving, is to be seen. At present I will profit by his advances, for, by the fiend, I have no other resource,"—the gamester's eye fell upon the purse which Don Ricardo had placed upon the table near him—"truly, it was a silly freak of passion that prompted me to dash his gold at the man's feet. I must be more cautious in the future, for such purses grow not on every bush in Mexico. And—now," continued Falcone, while his eye glowed with an expression of cunning resolve, "now that Ginton's death has bereaved his lovely sister, it may be that Gabriel Falcone will not be so unrelenting to the maiden—provided that his purse be full. This Don Ricardo shall assist me then, at least."

So saying, the young man, brooding over the means of furthering his schemes of villainy, snatched the purse from the table, and placed it once more in the garment from which he had taken it. Then, apparently exhausted, he closed his eyes as if to sleep.

CHAPTER VII.

THE DOUBLE FUNERAL AND A DISCOVERY.

THE sun was descending upon the broad and fertile valley of Mexico's incomparable valley—bathing the quivering city itself in a flood of yellow light, beneath which the lofty churches and turreted convents, and splendid private mansions glittered like a fairy panorama. On the beautiful Lake Texcoco, skimming amid the still attractive remnants of its once magnificent floating gardens, the light boats of pleasure-seekers darted to and fro, and the souls of romance-lovers, won by the beauty of the approaching evening, dispersed themselves at various points, enjoying the cool mountain breeze that flowed mysteriously from the Sierra de Ajusco of the north.

Wherever beauty reigns, it is tempered, perchance sanctified, by sorrow—and so, upon the quiet loveliness of the Mexican evening, when the perfume of a thousand flowers imparted a delicious aroma through all the air, and when the flute-like warbling of a hundred golden-plumaged birds united in a dreamy strain of music, till the atmosphere seemed loaded with its mingled wealth of harmony and fragrance, it was no wonder that a shadow intervened between the setting sun and those whose hearts were fitted to enjoy its brightness.

A funeral cortege emerged from the city, near the national theatre, and slowly took its way toward a quiet burial place, where thick-embowered groves, girdled with vines, and ornate openings, beset with flowers, marked the chosen spot of all for nature to receive her wearied children in the bosom of their mother earth. Slowly and solemnly over the highway and through a shaded road diverging from the lake, and up a gentle rise of verdure-covered hills, the funeral procession proceeded. It was not a large one. Scarcely a dozen persons composed the followers of the simple bier; but there were flowers upon the dark pall, and tears of heartfelt grief had watered them.

Behind the funeral carriage, a small caleche was driven by an aged negro. In it were a young girl clad in plain black deep skirt, and a man, who, by his garb, appeared to be a priest. Another vehicle followed, in which were seated two other persons, male and female. Under either vehicle, alternately, walked a large dog of the Newfoundland breed. He followed the body of his master. This funeral cortege was that which conveyed the body of Charles Clinton, the subject of this last chapter, and the mourners, few but real ones, were his young sister and her two servants, the faithful Yankee Puffin Pomfret, and the clergyman, Padre Herrera.

Slowly, until they reached the gate of the quiet burial-place, the procession passed along. No word was spoken, but the priest held the trembling hand of the young sister within his own, and the maiden felt that the sympathy of a strong and tender nature was sustaining her spirit in its hour of trial.

At the entrance of the graveyard, another hearse, followed by a single carriage, with but two persons in it, joined the cortege of the suicide, and together, for some time, the train proceeded to their destination. Two open graves, nearly side by side, were to receive the bodies of two, who in life had been strangers, but were here to be united, to sleep quietly in the same earth till the time when the "corruptible shall put on incorruption." Padre Herrata, as the stranger hearse passed opposite to that which bore the remains of Gideon, recognized in one of the occupants of the solitary carriage which followed it, a clergyman known to him as a most esteemed and worthy brother of his order. He saluted him with the customary salutation, at the same time pronouncing his name, Fray Pedro, and was responded to by a hearty "Peace be with you." At the same instant the eyes of the other person in the carriage, a young man of perhaps twenty years, who was clad in simple black, were raised slowly, and their gaze fell upon the face of the maiden who sat by the side of the priest Herrata.

At once a singular change was noticeable in the countenance of this young man. His cheeks, before pale and cold, became flushed with apparent excitement, his lips trembled, his eyes dilated. Padre Herrata noticed his agitation, and looked inquiringly toward Fray Pedro. The latter, however, was descending from the carriage, and did not catch the glance of his brother priest, but, so soon as he had alighted, took his station near the hearse, from which the undertaker and an assistant were now engaged in lifting the coffin. The general portion of the funeral duties was taking place at the other hearse. Hannibal, the negro, lifting one end of the coffin which inclosed the form that he had once supported in his childish days, in their happy American home, looked the solemn-looking hearse-driver to bear it to the narrow grave, while Lucille, the negro girl, and Pamela, stood directly by. Padre Herrata sustained the trembling frame of the sister, with whom he had left the carriage, and thus the train of burial proceeded, and two mortal bodies were consigned to dust.

neighboring graves, while the mellow subsons drifted through the thick-leaved grove, and the birds sang thrillingly a requiem for the dead.

Nor were the wailing inhabitants of that graveyard the only chorists at the stranger's grave. Full and tenderly arose from the lips of the two priests that impressive chant for the dead which their church ritual enjoins particularly to be sung on the occasion of interring strangers. Up through the lofty arches of that glorious cathedral of nature, swelling and rolling amid the woody aisles, and drifting gently among the flowers and vines, the sad but beautiful melody of that funeral chant dispersed itself upon the quiet evening air. And, while tombs and vault and grave were flooded with the golden sun of light that filled the western skies, and while the song of birds and requiem of priests arose together unto Heaven's throne, the mourners for the dead knelt down together—the young and old, the low and free, and murmured their responses to the solemn music of the funeral hymn.

The graves were near each other—the ladies worked side by side as they cast the sods upon the collins. Was it strange that, as the priests sang together, the two chief mourners for their respective dead should draw near unto one another? Was it strange, as the sister of Gilman, with eyes closed and hands outstretched with her departed brother's memory, knelt beside his grave, that she should feel her head pressed by another head, and her low sobs mingling with her own? She thought it was Padre Herrera who knelt near her, but in truth it was the young mourner who had followed the other home. His eyes were filled with tears, his breast heaved and sank tumultuously, and uttering a low wail, he clasped the maiden's hand within his own, and raised it to his trembling lips.

At this moment the chant of the priests ceased, the last sod fell upon the grave, and the Padre Herrera, drawing near the young man, just as the weeping eyes of Gilman's sister opened upon her stranger's countenance, said, in a low voice:

"My children—do you know one another?"

"Oh, indeed, indeed, I must be dead!" was the hurried exclamation of the young man, as he hastily thrust his head into his breast and drew forth a small book. Then opening its cover, while the funeral chant of Gilman's sister was fixed upon his face with a look, half of terror, half of interest, he disclosed the portrait of a young girl, which, in every lineament seemed the "counterfeit presentment" of the maiden by his side.

"'Tis she—it must be she!" he murmured, wildly.

"What means this, brother?" asked Padre Herrata, turning to his fellow-priest. "What youth is this, and what would he with this mourning maiden?"

Fray Pedro glanced for a moment at the picture which the young man held, and a sullen light broke over his features.

"I see—I see it all!" he cried. "Alonso—mark! Did not this picture belong to your uncle—the good Don Tello, who now lies at our feet?"

"Reverend father, it did. 'Twas the last gift that I received from my uncle's hands. It was the portrait of one whom—"

"I know it all, my son," rejoined the priest, "I was your uncle's confessor—his only confidant, save it might be yourself. That picture is the likeness of one whom Don Tello passionately loved in his youth, and who died in a foreign land. You, brother Herrata, well know the sad story, though many years have passed since the unhappy Donna Maria Minas—"

"Donna Maria Minas!" interrupted the young girl, with a sullen start, as she heard the words pronounced. "It was my mother's name."

"None may doubt that who look upon this portrait of Donna Maria and then upon your face, my daughter," responded Fray Pedro. "Doubtless the hand of Heaven is in this meeting. Mark! this picture, long preserved as the dearest treasure of his existence, by one who cherished your mother's memory to the forgetfulness of all the world—"

"Save only me," cried Alonso. "My father's love was ever to me all that a father could be."

"He was a just man," said the priest, solemnly, "and his reward is not to be doubted. Oh, Padre Herrata—"

This last exclamation was occasioned by the sullen discovery made by the good priest that the young maiden beside them had fallen into a state of insensibility. She still look upon the sword and clasped the portrait of Donna Maria in ner hands, her eyes fixed upon it with an intense earnestness. But no rays of intelligence fell from them—they were fixed but expressionless. The unhappy child, overcome by conflicting emotions, had swooned as she gazed, and now, as the two clergymen looked toward her, they beheld that two ready assistants were supporting her sinking form—on one side was the Yankee, Pomfret, and on the other, the youth Alonzo.

"Dead—dead! Oh, no—she is not dead!" cried the latter, his countenance growing ghastly with apprehension.

"Let the gal hev air, or she will be," rejoined the Yankee, with his prompt understanding and quickness of action. "Gently there—she's only a faintin'—and poor innocent, she's had a heap o' trouble—enough for one weak critter. Jes' stan' aside and she'll be all right again in a minute."

Saying this, the stalwart Pomfret with his right arm brushed every one aside, and lifting the maiden's slight figure in his left, as a mother would her babe, carried her in a moment from the grave to a small marble basin, where the dripping of a cool fountain was making music in unison with the song of birds.

Alonzo followed closely the Yankee's steps, while the two servants, Hannibal and Lucille, seized with dread that some new misfortune threatened the unhappy young mistress, gave way at once to violent grief, moaning and clasping their hands together, and calling upon their mistress to revive.

"Oh, Miss Teresa," cried Hannibal, passionately, "she's almost killing his worsh, 'don't a go way from us—don't a die, like Massa Charley—let's a dartin' missy—don't a die!"

And Lucille, running back and forth like one distracted, echoed the negro's plaints in her own half broken exclamations:

"Oh, die! die where you lies! Oh, what shall we do ourselves? Save my sweet mistress—let her live!"—my dear Mademoiselle Teresa, and let poor Lucille die once, three times—one dozen times."

"My good child, trust in God. He will not desert your mistress in this hour of trial," said Padre Herrata, striving to check the negro's vehement grief. "Look! even now the maiden revives! Yes! her eyes unclose to the light."

"Al! non dico! I am so glad!" cried the girl, a torrent of tears rushing from her eyes, while Hannibal uttered a loud cry of joy.

Mademoiselle Teresa had indeed opened her eyes, once more restored to animation by the cool water with which Pomfret had bathed her temples and sprinkled her pale face. But no consciousness appeared in the dim light which she cast around. It was evident she did not recognize any one.

"I'm mortal 'fraid the poor girl has taken it too hard," whispered the Yankee to Padre Herrera. "Her strength was almost gone when she got here, and this here new business has over-set her mind completely. Poor little creature—she's as tender as a hummin' bird, and no mistake!"

Uttering these words, Pomfret caused her to bathe the maiden's head with the cool fountain water; and kneeling beside, chafed her hands and wrists, calling upon her mistress with the most endearing names. At length the numbness which had terrified all so much, began to disappear from the young girl's frame, and a slight flush revisited her pallid cheeks.

Recovering in some degree, she was taken up the carriage, and they returned to the city. Pomfret, Alonso and Fray Pedro followed in another carriage; on the way Pomfret recounted the story of Ginton's death. Alonso listened with deep interest. Destiny had brought before him, on the occasion of his uncle's funeral, the daughter of her who was lost in his living thoughts.

CHAPTER VIII.

DON RICARDO RAMOS AND HIS STORY.

Two days had elapsed since the funeral of Don Teresa and Ginton. Teresa, the daughter, after remaining for hours in the supposition into which she had fallen in her brother's grave, awoke at length to life with all its sad recollections and realities. The good Padre Herrera was attending to his kindly attentions, and the faithful servants, devoted to their mistress by the strongest ties of early association and love to her gentle character, were untiring in their devotion to her.

service. The Yankee, whose position as regarded the favor of President Herrera had been made manifest to the officials on the occasion of their domiciliary visit, was permitted, as a countryman, to exercise the duties of an executor on such property as the deceased possessed at the time of his death. This, on examination, was discovered, as both Padre Herrata and Penfret had anticipated, to be scanty enough; for the unfortunate young man, involved in expenses during his brief sojourn in Mexico, and induced by his evil associates to risk his means on the uncertain chance of the gaming-table, had been stripped of the last dollar upon the fatal night which had witnessed his death. Save a few jewels possessed by Teresa herself, the furniture of their dwelling, and a small supply of money which the sister had retained, nothing remained of a comfortable competence which a few months before had been the fortune of the two orphans.

Two years had passed since the death of that mother whose unhappy history has already been briefly adverted to. When, wearied of the union which had made her life wretched, Donna Maria Palome had fled from her home, and cast herself upon the wide world, she was yet innocent of infidelity against her husband. Though Palome's character and habits had rendered her life miserable, the unhappy wife had never entertained a thought of wrong. The sympathy and apparent devotedness of the young Don Tello had, it is true, awakened a responsive chord in her generous nature, but she had not loved him. He was to her, in the best period of their acquaintance, as a brother, in whose honor and education she was convinced that she might rely, but no warmer feelings than those of a sister had ever entered into her heart.

But young, impetuous and unhappy, she had been worked upon by one whose life was as much stained with excess as even that of Palome himself. Don Ricardo Ramon, the born companion of her husband, had cast his evil eye upon the beautiful wife, and resolved to make her his victim. As insidious and cunning as he was bold and wicked, he sought to insinuate himself in Donna Maria's favor, by all the arts in which he was an adept. With pretended sympathy, he hinted of the neglect with which Palome evidently treated her—with affected indignation he wished that he could claim a brother's privilege to call him to account. He shrewdly made it appear that he sought to restrain Falcone in his evil courses, when, in reality, he was urging him constantly to the worst dissipation. Donna Maria at first lent an ear to the words of her husband's friend; and more readily, that a violent sickness which had attacked Don Tadeo, her youthful friend, had deprived her of the gentle support which his truthful character ever afforded her. She could not believe in such baseness as was a portion of Don Ricardo's very being, and consequently she admitted him to her society, and often to her confidence, until the villain, grown daring through her unsuspecting kindness, ventured to unveil his true design, and proposed that she should fly with him from the capital to one of his estates in eastern Mexico.

The first intimation of Don Ricardo's motives terrified the wife; but when, with crafty deliberation, he unfolded his schemes, and, as if secure of her compliance, proceeded to paint, in glowing colors, the life to which he would lead her, the pride of the woman roused her to resolution. She was of a high-spirited and ancient race. The blood of the Minis, her family, was reckoned as the sovereign of old Spain, and it was the pride which could not brook their reduced position that had induced her parents to give their child to the wealthy Falcone, albeit the latter boasted not a drop Minis blood. But Don Ricardo Ramos, rich though he was, felt not the claims of birth to back his pretensions, since he was of the mixed race which claims as much affinity with the savage tribes of Mexico as with those who deem themselves the contemporary descendants. This circumstance might, perhaps, have had little weight with Donna Maria, had her heart been interested in the man who addressed her; but she did not spare the man from her presence—she did not appeal him with a look of lofty anger from her flashing eyes, nor pierce him with accents of withering contempt.

"Don Ricardo, you talk like a poet; you paint the future like an artist. A woman would be unreasonable to reject so enthusiastic a lover for a husband who neglects her."

Don Ricardo threw himself on his knees at the feet of Donna Maria, and seizing her hand, covered it with kisses.

Only one stipulation was made by the lovely woman—they until they should have arrived upon the lover's estates, near Monterey, no further mention must be made of love—no closer intimacy exist than that of the past. Don Ricardo regarded it as a whim, but Donna Maria was inexorable, and the arrangement was made. All things were prepared by the expectant lover—the lady secured her private jewels, kissed with a tear the infant child of Falcone, which, though she loved not its father, was yet dear to her—and then gave her hand to Don Ricardo Ramos, for an elopement, while Falcone, absorbed in his worthless career, discovered not the double treachery of his wife and friend.

As the lover lifted the beautiful wife to her carriage, in which she had stipulated that she should ride alone, he attempted to kiss her lips, but she repulsed him.

"Don Ricardo—your promise?" she cried, gayly. "Will there not be time enough when we reach your home?"

So Don Ricardo Ramos contented himself with mounting his horse, and riding beside, and behind, and before the carriage, wherever he could catch a glimpse of the closely-veiled face of his lovely prize. Thus he escorted Donna Maria Falcone from the capital.

But all fine things have an end. One morning, when Don Ricardo arose betimes at the small hostel, where the horses had been put up for the night, and after glancing with a satisfied look at his travelling mirror, hurried to tender his morning salutation to the fair Donna Maria, and congratulate her upon their nearness to Monterey, which they should reach during the day—behold! Donna Maria was not to be found. His own horse was still in the stable, but the horses and carriage of the beautiful lady, as well as the lady herself, had disappeared.

"Where is she? In the fiend's name, answer!" cried Don Ricardo to the trembling host.

"The—lady?" stammered the man.

"You seem lost—yes?" roared Don Ricardo.

The host did not know; she had ordered a relay of horses, and departed during the night—did not desire that the gentleman should be disturbed, but had left a note for him.

"A note! The fiends—give it to me!"

It was brief, but quite explanatory.

"Don Ricardo Ramos:—I return thanks for your escort which I have accepted thus far upon my journey. You have been deceived in my character, as I was in yours. Though I am an unhappy woman, I can not be a guilty one. Farewell forever."

Don Ricardo Ramos stormed—took his horse and rode to his estates—scoured the country in every direction. But no tidings did he gather of the fugitive, save that relays of horses had been taken to the confines of Texas. At Matamoros all trace was lost of Donna Maria Falcone.

So Don Ricardo returned to Mexico, to be accused of the elopement, and half suspected of murder—to fight a duel with his friend Falcone, and receive a bullet in his body as a lasting memento of that affair—and finally, to leave his native country and become a wanderer in foreign lands, vainly seeking to discover the woman who had refused to become his mistress, and on whom he planned to revenge himself. But he saw Donna Maria no more.

And she—beautiful, proud and desperate—what destiny was in store for her? Truly, an extraordinary one, even though in its outset romantic. Flying at once from her husband and Don Ricardo, she crossed the American border and reached a military station of the United States army. Here she found honorable protection, and became acquainted with a young Crooke of New Orleans, who, with his sister, was about to return to the States. She gladly accepted the escort which they offered, and accompanied them upon their way. The young merchant became passionately enamored of her, and Donna Maria discovered that her own heart could love. She made a confidant of the merchant's sister, who was of a noble nature, and had grown warmly attached to her Mexican friend. The result was commonplace enough. Through his correspondence, the young lover learned of the death of Falcone, which occurred soon after their arrival at New Orleans. His proposal was accepted, and Donna Maria became Melane Ginton, and bore him the mother of two lovely children, one of whom we have seen at the death of a soldier, in the presence of his unknown brother, Gabriel Falcone, and the other, a daughter whom we last shortly recognized from the deadly swoon into which she had fallen at her unhappy brother's grave.

But if the union of Clinton and Donna Maria was commonplace, their life was a happy one. For nearly twenty years they dwelt together in elegant private life, unmingling with the world, but content in their own family enjoyment. Maria looked back upon her brief relationship to Falcone, as a sad dream from which she had soon awakened. At times, the mother's heart reverted to her child, deprived of her maternal care, and often she regretted that she had not taken the babe with her upon her abrupt departure. But she recollected that under the circumstances such a thing was impossible. To co-exist with a lover, while she yet pressed a husband's child to her bosom, would have seemed hypocrisy, and though never contemplating other than the step actually taken, still she had known before-hand how fraught it was with danger, and how could she have imperilled the life of her innocent babe in her own wild expedition? But it was past—she had become another's wife, and she strove to banish the recollection of the single tie which linked her to her native land.

Thus years fled swiftly by, and the two children of Maria's second marriage, Charles and Teresa, grew up lovingly bound to their parents. How many, how bright were the hopes kindled around the fair young brother and sister? How often the husband and his foreign wife speculated upon the time when they should become old, and their offspring, young and beautiful, sustain and gladden their declining years?

But such was not to be. Reverse came suddenly upon the merchant Clinton. Distressing miseries assailed his affairs, and at length, from wealth he speedily sank himself reduced to little more than a pauper. He grieved not for this on his own account, nor did Maria; but they loved their children, and with natural pride, desired to leave them in the style to which they had been accustomed from infancy. But as this could no longer be effected, Clinton gathered the wreck of his possessions, and procured the greater portion for the benefit of his children, and himself came down at once, he piled up with the remainder a new fortune for himself. The crisis, however, fell well upon him. The arrival of the season which so cruelly assailed New Orleans, made his appearance just at the season when Orleans's affairs were beginning to take an auspicious turn. It saved the mother and her children, and by her husband's side. It deprived him of his Maria, and with her he lost hope itself. Ginton did not survive the loss of his wife.

"He tried

To do without her—like I did not—and died."

In one short month the two slept side by side, and Charles and Teresa were orphans.

At this period the brother was at college—the sister at school. They remained in their respective positions till their education was completed, and then received the small portion which had been secured for them by their father's timely provision. It amounted to but ten thousand dollars, but Teresa was confident that it would be a great fortune for them, at least till her brother, on whom she doted, should realize by his talents all that their parents had lost. Alas! the hopes of youth!

Charles Ginton had often heard his mother speak of her native land, though he, like Teresa, was unaware of the early events of her history. Nevertheless, the associations of the descriptions he had in childhood received to him. Diana Maria's lips, had given him an earnest desire to visit Mexico, and, consequently, when, with his sister, they proposed to themselves a future course of life, the idea of a short visit to the neighboring republic was first among her suggestions. Teresa, who believed her brother's judgment infallible, at once assented to Charles' proposal, the more readily as he assured her that he designed making such arrangements as would enable him on his return to pursue his father's business as a consignor of the Mexican and Indian trade. Thus the two children, for they were little more, left their native New Orleans, and set out on their ill-fated visit to the capital of Mexico. What afterward occurred need not be told again. Ginton, possessed of engaging manners and apparently wealthy, soon found himself immersed in the gay life of Mexican young men—he became acquainted with Captain Falcone—was led into dissipation and play, and his money

"A thing

O'er which the raven flaps his funeral wing."

CHAPTER IX.

THE BLOOD OF THE MINAS

Two days, as we have said, had elapsed since the funeral of Charles Ginton, and in that time Putnam Pomfret had ascertained the exact state of the surviving orphan's worldly affairs. With his habitual calculation, he knew that what little cash and effects, save her jewels, Teresa possessed would be barely sufficient to defray the expenses of her journey home; and the two slaves, Harri-bell and Lettice, had they not been already emancipated by the Mexican laws he knew would never be disposed of by their gentle mistress. Consequently they must be provided for, and our Yankee was not himself rich in personal means, though his shrewd business had was already making itself felt in many commercial circles of Mexico.

Putnam Pomfret, like her himself in Mexico, with but little else than his native thrift, and some services which it had been his good fortune to render to the existing government, as his capital, had nevertheless managed, through the assistance of some influential Mexican friends, to organize a profitable trading business, which, requiring his supervision alone, was now bringing him steadily and increasing returns for skill and enterprise. At the present time he discovered that his presence in an eastern province of the republic might be of advantage to himself in point of profit, and it required not much consideration on the part of the worthy North American, to discern that it was his plain and downright duty to see his young countrywoman escorted safely to her distant American home. Therefore, with as much red knight errantry as ever existed in the days of chivalry, our hero considered himself the defender and protector of the orphan beauty, and took with him under his direction, not only all preparations for the journey, but the care and expense of the lady's household itself. In this quality of executor, Pomfret possessed an undoubted right to act in this manner, though a few would have asserted such right, accompanied as it was with constant pecuniary personal expense. Pomfret, however, as disinterested as he was unpretending, used his executorship only as a plausible covering for his concealed generosity. He knew very well, that, while Teresa would shrink from receiving benefits at the hands of a stranger, she could very well be induced to believe that, as executor, he was but providing supplies from her deceased brother's effects.

"And how on earth," quoth the Yankee, to himself, "how on earth am I goin' to administer, unless I get something to administer with? That gal and those niggers are bound to live, and while Putnam Pomfret's got a dollar, he ain't a-goin' to let a lady suffer—particularly when that here lady is a countrywoman, and a darned sight better than any of those Mexican feminines that rife round the market, just like yellow angels. Jehosaphat!"

In accordance with this resolution of the indefatigable Yankee, everything went on as firmly in the disposal of Teresa Ginton. The servants went regularly about their duties, at the same time making the necessary preparations for leaving the city; and Putnam, without parade or assumption, quietly constituted himself a "business committee of one," as he jocosely expressed it, to make everything about the young mistress as comfortable as possible.

Padre Herrero observed all this, for the priest well knew the character of his American friend, and also the state of the unfortunate Ginton's affairs. He smiled approvingly, as he noticed the methodical manner in which Pomfret attended to all that was necessary, and providing the latter's heart, still, in his fervent manner:

"Signor Pomfret, you are a noble heart, and I esteem you more as I know you better. Heaven has truly blessed you in the friends it has given me."

"Padre, you jist talk so, because you're good yourself. I ain't a-doin' more than my duty, and I shall be with all your time, and heart for the same reason."

"It would be well if some of the crowned and uncrowned lords of earth were as sure of reaching there as thou dost," murmured Padre Herrero to himself as he turned away.

Alonso Vallejo, the nephew of Don Tadeo, after his return from the funeral where he had become so strangely engaged with the daughter of his uncle's cherished friend, remained in a state of mind entirely new to him. He wondered that his thoughts dwelt not so much upon his recent loss as upon the singular revelation it had caused. The image of the beautiful Teresa, as he had beheld her kneeling by her brother's grave, and then reposing, pale and deathly, upon the breast of the faithful Lucille, presented itself constantly before his memory, and he tortured himself with apprehensions concerning her safety. Early on the following morning he was at the house into which he had beheld her borne still wrapped in slumber, and there learned from his new acquaintance, Putnam, the state of the maiden's health. He lingered long that day, and again in the evening he presented himself. Thus for two days, the young man, feeling that love for the almost unknown girl was henceforth to be a part of his being, pondered upon his uncle's sad story, and treated his imagination with a thousand unique uncertainties.

"Ah!" he cried, as he paced up and down the floor of the apartment which had been the studio of his revered relative, "ah! if she should love another, I feel that my uncle's fate will be mine."

But on the evening of the second day, on reaching the house of Teresa, Alonso was informed by Hannah that his mistress was so far recovered as to leave that morning, sitting in an iron chair on the porch, opening upon the small garden attached to its rear.

"And a gentleman is with her," called the negro.

"A gentleman?" cried Alonso, starting. "Ah, a friend of the master's—or Putnam's, probably."

"Yes, said Hannah Putnam, your way tonight here will please Hannah, but he says he will look soon. Do not mind it, my lady. General I wish he had brother—his partner."

"He is evidently no friend of yours, Hannah," said Val-lio, smiling at the negro's frankness, though he more than ever doubted that the gentleman in question might prove to be a devoted admirer of Teresa. "Will he remain long with your mistress?"

"I think not," answered Hannah. "Miss Teresa no like him nuther."

This piece of information greatly relieved poor Alonso, so he quietly took a seat, in order to await the appearance of the Yankee, while Hannibal departed to attend to his duties. In the mean time, we will take the liberty of introducing the reader to the little inner parlor of the dwelling occupied by Teresa Glinton, where that lady now reclined, upon a sofa, near the open window. She was very pale. A loose white robe, modestly trimmed with narrow lace, and clasped across the bosom with a small brooch, in which was a portrait of her brother, covered, but could not conceal the graceful symmetry of her form. Her hair, parted over the wide brow, hung in thick ringlets upon her shoulders, in one cluster of which her left hand had buried itself, supporting her head. Her right pressed tightly against her heart, which was beating with evident excitement. Her eyes were tearless and very bright.

Opposite to her sat Gabriel Falcone, his eyes fixed upon hers with a look which was manifestly intended to express much tender sympathy, but to which the disquieted features of the young man imparted an uncertain and not attractive character. But his voice was low and alluring.

"I loved your poor brother deeply, Señora. I appreciated his noble qualities—his earnestness of nature—"

"His credulous nature, which made him too easily deceived, sir," cried Teresa, her voice quivering with restrained agitation. "Oh that Charles had never entered this ill-fated city; he would not then have fallen into a thousand villain's snares."

Falcone looked with amazement upon the young girl, for he had never heard such harsh language from her at any time before. He bit his lip, in the effort to preserve his own proper demeanor, and answered:

"Truly, the Señora is unjust to one who loved her brother—who would serve herself?"

"I should serve my brother—serve me!" exclaimed Teresa, slightly elevating her voice, but altering not otherwise her manner. "Señor Falcone, you can serve me best by speaking no more of him, and leaving me at once and forever."

"Nay, Señora," murmured the unassuming Falcone, in his singularly mellow tones, "I should be false to my esteem for him, and untrue to my deep respect for you, could I neglect my duty at this time. Do not condemn me that I sympathize with you, Señora Ginton—so lovely, so unfortunate—” “Cease, sir. This is no time nor place for flatteries!” cried Teresa, suddenly rising from the couch on which she had partially reclined, and flinging her hands upon her bosom.

She spoke in a voice of determination, and her eyes, dilating into brilliancy, were fixed radiantly upon the intruder. So might have looked her mother, Donna Maria, upon the man who proposed her dishonor, had she not chosen to conceal her indignation. But the blood of the Minas was in the veins of both, and though Teresa's glance dwelt so fixedly upon his bold countenance, the eye of Gabriel Falcone fell not, nor changed from its look of seeming sensibility.

“Señor Falcone, I am young, and the ways of the world are unfamiliar to me. I know not what wicked prompting in your heart led you to tempt my trusting brother to his ruin. I know not what new design of evil you may harbor against an orphan girl. But, in my soul, Señor Falcone, I feel that on your head lies the blood of Charles Ginton. You, Señor, enticed, betrayed him to his fate. But for you he had been innocent, and I had not been desolate.”

The maiden covered her eyes, as she said this, with both her hands, while her breast heaved tumultuously. Falcone, hardened as he was by selfishness and dissipation, could not for the moment recover his assurance sufficiently for a reply, and Teresa, collecting her feelings, continued:

“Now, sir, be satisfied with the injury you have caused. I implore you to leave me not with your compunction. Depart from this house, Señor Falcone, and let me forget that you exist, ere my memory urges me to curse your name.”

Teresa stood before the libertine with all her mother's pride legible upon her features, yet tempered with a sadness that made its exhibition still more impressive. But Falcone was not one to be thus repulsed.

“Señora,” he rejoined, blandly, “it would be impious for me to believe that such gentle lips could utter a curse—”

“Have I not said that this is no period for flattery? Señor Falcone, hear from those lips that I hate—despise you! Hear, when I declare that the bitterness of my brother's death, is that he died by following one so base as you. Now, sir—away! Dare no longer to pollute the air which he breathed with your false-hearted words. Go! or my parents shall hear me utter my contempt!"

The young girl's form swelled into majesty with the indignation which filled her spirit, and Falcone, while he writhed under the evident loathing which she manifested, could not but feel that she was a woman born to awaken admiration and respect. Nevertheless, with the hardness which formed a large portion of his character, he did not even then dream of softening the obduracy of her feelings toward him; for Falcone believed himself skilled in all the ways of womanhood, and smiled within himself at the thought that such a child as Teresa could be proof against his art and experience. Therefore, though the last words of the maiden pressed heavily on his ear, he neither chose to answer them nor comply with their requisitions. He simply let his glance fall suddenly upon the floor, and leaning his forehead upon the open palm of his hand, seemed for a moment absorbed in abstract meditation.

Teresa remained standing, her slight but erect form securely supported by the window-frame against which she partly leaned. Her eyes still rested upon Falcone's face, and the scorn which had a moment since wreathed her delicately-chiselled lip, yet gave a determined expression to all her features.

At length, as if by a quick impulse, Falcone sprang suddenly from the chair on which he sat, and throwing himself upon one knee before the young girl, clasped both her hands within his own, before she could make a movement to prevent the action. Then, speaking in a hoarse whisper, with undoubted sincerity gleamed from his passionate eyes, the young gamester proceeded with an energy of resolve that constrained Teresa's attention before she could consult her scruples.

"Listen to me, Teresa," cried Gabriel Falcone. "You shall hear me! I love you—passionately, madly love you! Think you that with such a feeling in my heart, I could have meditated aught against your brother's safety—or against your peace of mind? No! by all the saints, I dream as deeply as yourself the loss of one so dear to both of us. Suffer!

Señora! drive me not to despair—urge me not to become all you have declared me to be! I love you, I adore you. Beware, ere you rouse within my nature other and different feelings—”

Palmer passed, for he caught the bright eye of Teresa fixed on his with a look of such defiant scorn that it almost burned into his soul. The daughter of Donna Maria had forgotten her weakness, her suffering, her sorrow. Her every feature rivet in marble beauty, with nostrils swollen and lips compressed, while the light that blazed from her glorious eyes seemed to irradiate her entire countenance, she towered a moment before the gambler's vision, and then, thrusting her hand beneath her white robe, where it was clasped over her bosom, drew forth a long, thin-bladed dagger, which she uplined suddenly, its point aimed at the heart of the villain.

The young gambler was brave and confident, but the boldness of Teresa's action startled him. He immediately sprang to his feet, and retreated a step from the threatening weapon. But a moment afterwards he seemed to be ashamed of his apparent timidity, and with a smile that partook as much of bitterness as humor, stretched out his hand, as if playfully to put the stiletto aside.

“Beware, Señora—I trifle not. Go!” cried the unmoved maiden, pointing to the door.

Palmer laughed, and drawing by a waving his hand, seized the maiden's wrist, and compressed it so harshly that a loud cry escaped her lips.

“Ah, pretty one, you can not harm me now,” cried the young man, mockingly.

But scarcely had the cry which she uttered for Teresa's eye, when the door of the apartment was opened, and the form of a young man appeared upon the threshold. It was Alvaro Vellido. A single glance sufficed to discover to the youth the position of Teresa Gilman, though he knew not who was her companion. The dagger, still clasp'd in the maiden's hand, while her wrist was compressed by the stranger's grasp, and from which she was struggling to free herself, her look of mingled pain and terror, which Alvaro at once that the other gentleman was no well-meant guest in the house. So, without staying a second for further information as to the merits of the case, our young student sprang forward at once, and dealt a heavy blow at the forehead of Falcone, which made the gamester not only release his hold, but reel for a moment, like a drunken man.

"Señora—Señora! are you hurt?" cried Vallego, in great agitation, as he turned to look upon the maiden, without appearing to think any further upon the man whom he had struck. But Teresa Ginton, more watchful than her defender, saw that Falcone was about to rush upon his assailant.

"Take care!" she exclaimed, suddenly, and threw herself forward, with the stiletto raised in her hand, just at the instant when the infuriated gamester was about to attack the student. "Back! Señor!" she cried, interposing herself between Falcone and the young man. "Unhappily as you are, I permit you to go uncathed; but go at once!"

Gabriel Falcone's features writhed with passion, and the foam gathered on his lips.

"Is this the favored one?" he cried, hoarsely. "How many lovers has the virtuous Teresa concealed?"

Alonso Vallego heard the taunt, and springing before the fair girl who had thus opposed him, he turned round, and met the face of the gamester, laughing at the same time, his neck to the throat. Falcone was of superior build, and stronger in reality than the young student, but the energy of the latter's assault bore him backward toward the open door, through which he would in a moment have been precipitated, had not he succeeded in gripping firmly the others' arms, and thus impeding the exercise of his muscles. Then, drawing his own strength, he bent suddenly and cast the student violently upon the floor. The next moment Falcone raised a dagger and lifted it above Vallego's breast—but not before the brave Teresa Ginton had discovered the man's intention. Quick as thought she sprang forward, and seizing the gamester's hand, turned his weapon aside, while her own stiletto threatened him in turn. But at this moment a gentle pressure upon her head caused her to look up, and she beheld the mild face of Padre Herrera, who, with Penares, had just entered the apartment.

"Don't kill the cat—he ain't worth it," cried the Yankee. "Jehosophat!" he continued, looking admiringly upon the Mexican, while, with all the opportunity imaginable, he inserted his fingers beneath the collar of Falcone's coat and unceremoniously dragged that gentleman from the prostrate Vallojo. "Jehosophat! Miss Teresa—you're clear grit, an' no mistake. Regular American spunk, by kingdom! Who's afraid, I'd like to know, when our gals can protect themselves so fashion? Here, you black-muzzled, yell-r-skinned chap, I dunno who you are, or where you come from nuther, but jist you walk Spanish this time, an' if you want to settle, call on Putnam Pomfret."

So saying, while Alvaro Vallojo arose to his feet, and Teresa, clinging to Padre Hernan, seemed about to relapse into the deadly state from which she had so lately recovered, the imperious Yankee, confining Falcone as with an iron grasp, thrust him forcibly out of the room, and through the outer apartment, to the open hall-door, where stood the negro Hamidal. Here, releasing him, he said, quietly:

"You know my name, and somethin' o' my natur. So, good-by, and keep your distance."

Falcone ground his teeth together, and cast a malignant look upon the unmoved Yankee. Then clutching his hat and cane, which the grinning negro extended to him, he rushed from the house.

"Gorra! dat am de tickle!" cried Hamidal, clapping his hands delightedly, when the Yankee had returned to the inner room. "Dat Massa Pomfret ain't 'traid de debil li'le!" Oh, Missy Lechit! what for you no be here, for see the fun?" he asked, of the maddo girl, who now made her appearance. "Massa Falcone he put he walkin' papers. Gorra nifty, how he go!"

"He go?" returned the girl. "Do you think I not see him? Mass! I am full of fear he will come back and kill us all. O ciel!"

"Nether you fear! Massa Pomfret cut him up, like claw o' lawd. Gorra! He make on'y one mouf-ful ob Massa Falcone."

CHAPTER X.

THE ACTORS IN A COMING DRAMA.

THE position of public affairs in the Mexican republic, at the point to which our story has arrived, was exceedingly critical. The administration was far from being secure; for a large party existed adverse to the tempering policy pursued by President Herrera, and ready for a change of rule, even through revolution. Consequently, Putnam Pomfret, whose residence in Mexico had made him tolerably familiar with the political harlequinades continually going on, was not unprepared for a communication made to him by Padre Herrata at their next meeting.

"General Herrera has resigned, and a new government enters on the field at once," was the substance of the information imparted by the priest.

"Then, I suppose General Herrera's designs are at a discount," said Pomfret.

"What do you mean, sir, by his designs?"

"Oh, nothing extra. Only, as I sort of suspected that Herrera wouldn't hold on to the helm, when squalls were coming, and as that fightin' General Paroles I mention lately came next, you see, I called 'twas best to get our walking papers from Herrera and start for the frontier, about order. You know, padre, that Mister Paroles ain't best friends with neither you nor me, and he'll be just likely to reject all our applications, if he once gets here in the capital. What'd ye say about that, padre?"

"I admire your forethought, good sir," responded the priest. "It would be no easy matter for me, or any of Herrera's friends, to procure a favor from General Paroles, should I trust the new administration will be a particularly wise one. So I rejoice to hear that you prepared President Herrera's resignation to your prospects. For a short time, at least, it will be respected."

"Here are the papers, signed and sealed for Putnam Pomfret and Susan Gilman, family and servants," answered the Yankee. "So you see, padre, you can just go along, as one of the family."

"Yes," said the priest, pausing, thoughtfully, "we may have other enemies specially on our track. Are you aware that the young man whom you encountered yesterday is a known partisan of Paredes?"

"That other fellow? He be damned! Ask pardon, padre, he be all right with me, for an enemy?"

"Be not too confident, my good friend. Times like the present place power in strange hands. But do you know who this young man is?"

"I call him, if he snarls round that poor old my mare, I'll let him know who Pennam Penflet is!" returned the North American, shaking his head. "However, padre, let's know who in time the vermin is, any how—"

The priest was about to speak, when the appearance of a third person at the open door of the room caused him to rise hastily, and advance to meet the new-comer, who approached with the expression, and with both hands extended.

"Anselmo! my noble boy!" cried Padre Herrera, falling the visitor in his arms, while Penflet grasped one of his hands, and wrung it energetically.

"Captain Hernandez, by thunder!" and there wasn't a word more that came of the scene that I'd get more to say, now I tell you."

The pleasure thus heartily welcomed returned the Yankee's glowing with equal warmth, while replying to the affectionate demonstrations of Padre Herrera, whose eyes dwelt upon his happy face with the admiration of a parent.

Anselmo Zumotin was indeed an object of interest, as he stood before his friends—his fine form, erect and powerful, bending over both. Sincere and majestic, yet flexible, the look and power of this young man seemed alike capable of action and endurance. He was clad in a light suit of green cloth, half soldier's and half hunter's, as if he had just stepped from a prison, from some forest thicket. A woman hat, with a green feather in its band, crowned his round head, that was heavily covered with curls of glossy black. Altogether, Anselmo Zumotin was a man for women to love and for rivals to envy.

"But you are pale, my son. You bring not the brown hue of health from your western home."

"I must seek it elsewhere—perhaps in foreign lands," answered the young man, smiling with a sad expression, which did not escape the priest's notice.

"You are unhappy, Anselmo," said the padre, tenderly. "I will not ask you why—perchance I do not need to ask. But why do you speak of foreign travel? The present is no time to leave your native land."

"Are, then, the rumors that I heard on my way hither, to be believed—that the republic is threatened from abroad?"

"The countrymen of our friend Pomfret are covetous of the spoils left by Montezuma," answered Padre Herrata, with a smile. "Is it not so, Señor?" he inquired of the Yankee.

"Well, I callate," replied Pomfret, "that if Minister Selden goes ham mad, ther'll be the doome to pay in Washington. Our people are nater hard to manage when they're rize?"

"And under the sway of a war-party here," rejoined the priest, "who can hope that a conflict can be averted? But, in any event," continued Padre Herrata, clasping Zumozin's hand again, "there is but one course for you, my son—Mexico may need defense alike against internal and foreign foes."

"And I sware my best course is jist to make a bee-line for the Rio Grande or Vera Cruz, quicker'n chain lightning," exclaimed the Yankee. "There's mighty few o' your Mexican countrymen I'd cotton to, any how. There's Capting Zumozin here, and yourself, padre, and that ar' Capting Nunez, who's a Colonel now, I callate, I allow you're all braves, and I'd stan' by you, ag'in the world! As you say, padre, Capting Zumozin is bound for to fight his country's battles, and there's nary flinch in him, no matter what's the scrimmage! But, by thunder—" ejaculated Pomfret, suddenly brushing his elbow across both eyes, to hide their moisture, while he seized both of Zumozin's hands in his own—"I'd hate to lose any harm comin' to you or Captain Nunez. That be! I hope there won't be any war, arter all."

"Let us pray that there may not be," said Padre Herrata, solemnly. "But, Anselmo my son, your arrival is unexpected. How is the Señor Montagnone, your father?"

"In good health and here in the city," replied Zumozin. "He accompanied me hither, and designed proceeding forward to Vera Cruz, whence we had nearly determined to embark for the United States."

"You will now, I think, alter your intention, my son. Whatever may be the form in which it shall come, certain it is that danger threatens our country. Much have I heard, Andrew, of your noble acts upon your estates—of the improvement and elevation of your tenants, the civilization of the Indian population, and—"

"Say not civilization, Padre Herrata," interrupted Zumozin, "at least not such civilization as is manifested in this unhappy capital, with its Indians and Lepros. No, my father, if I have influenced the wild tribes who inhabit the regions around Matamoros, it has been, thank Heaven, to cause them to cherish more devotedly the independence which they inherit from the unconquered race of Aztlán. I have not yoked these free children of Nature like oxen to the plow, confining them to corn-planting, that their mighty hunting-grounds might be made spoil for speculation. I have not poisoned them with fiery drinks, nor taught them avarice and theft, and falsehood—lessons too early learned, too long practiced, by the wretched tribes of these lower districts. No, Padre Herrata, the northern Indians with whom I sojourned, eating at their hearths, and sleeping peacefully in their humble cabins, look upon Zumozin, not as a trader, or a government agent, nor propagandist of new creeds; but as a man, like themselves, pitying their miseries, recognizing their virtues, and strengthening their hopes."

The speaker paused, checking with an effort the enthusiasm that had led him to speak earnestly upon a subject which of all others interested him most; for Zamora's sympathy with the poor Indian tribes was not the effect of philanthropy alone. Himself a child of the ancient race, a descendant of the Aztec nobles, whose blood he proudly ran in defense of their country's rights, he was not unmindful of the fact of the heavy Spanish taxation which had brought the Indian tribes of Toluca, it is no marvel that the accumulated wrongs which had reduced the aboriginal inhabitants to a state of degradation noticeable among nearly all the native population of Lower Mexico furnished a theme for his thoughts at all times, and often led him into eloquent expression of those thoughts. Dwelling of late among the yet untamed people who inhabited the almost impenetrable wildernesses of the continent, he had formed a plan, and tried, it is true, by entreaties, but not at all by methods, of uniting the scattered and dissimilar tribes, who owned a common country, into a united, civilized nation, federated by a single object, the preservation of their rude independence.

In his own character, Zunuzin combined much that was requisite for the successful prosecution of a scheme like this. Well read and educated, he could avail himself of all the experimental lore of history in applying his project to the rude comprehension of his savage friends—brave and enterprising, he won their respect by deeds which rivaled their own—grave in speech, and a master of the Indian tongue, he could move their council to smiles or tears; and added to these qualities, he was recognized and revered by the most potent of the tribes as a true son of the ancient kindly race who once ruled the empire of Tenochtitlan. And when Zunuzin, garbed in the romantic costume of the long-patched Aztec people, and crowned with a diadem of eagle's plumes, stood amid the assembled warriors of these stern northern tribes, and spoke, in their native language, words of hope and inspiration—truly he seemed to these rude men the embodiment of majesty.

"Oh, children of our dead mother, Aztlán!" he would cry out, stretching his arms above their bowed heads, "why are ye scattered like fire-flakes, children before the wind? Why are ye spoiled of your inheritance, and the land which your fathers held made now the foot-stool of strangers? Behold! ye are numerous like the oaks of the wood; ye have strength and stand erect like them. But the ax of the pale-skinned Spaniard will soon be at the roots of the oak; and its heavy trunk must fall—its branches must be gathered and burned at the stranger's camp-fire."

Then, raising his voice, as he marked the deep emotion which followed his bold prediction, Zunuzin would burst in a strain of enthusiastic hope.

"Children of Aztlán—doubt ye not! Ye are many—ye are strong. Come up together in concert! Let the tribes then afar send their young men and their wise chiefs. Let the Indian no longer lift his hand against an Indian, but join in the great feast of union. Let us learn how the Spaniards march on the war-path. Let us have captains and an army like the strangers, and be together a great nation once more. Then shall we build up cities like our Aztec fathers, and the red warriors of the land shall come to us, seeking shelter beneath our power. And we will unite all the tribes from the mountains to the sea, and be as one warrior and one wise chief, possessing the land in common, even as our fathers of Aztlan. Behold, children! the spirits of the dead look down upon us, and I hear their words, crying: 'Join! join! descendants of Aztlan! join, and become a great and mighty people!'

With such harangues had Zam-zin unfolded to the tribes among whom he sojourned, the plan of an Indian confederacy that might succeed in arresting the decay which he knew too well must be the fate of all the race, should they in their present divided state, become more intimately known to the encroaching white man. The craft and violence which had reduced the aborigines of the tierra caliente to a condition almost and altogether in the extreme, would be equally ruinous to the yet untrampled domains of the upper regions above the city of Mexico, just as soon as the marauding adventurers and traders should become sufficiently numerous to warrant their summary methods of conquering. The object of Zam-zin, therefore, was, by some wise plan of confederation, to consolidate the warring families and remnants of nations into a united people, formidable in point of numbers, and governed by such regulations as would admit of their being disciplined in military science, and taught the rudiments of a sound rational education. The scheme was not Utopian; indeed, it was one which presented important results, and which, if devised at any period before the Spanish had corrupted the native intellect, might have preserved the latter from much of the misery which is now their lot in the interior of Mexico.

Such a plan of confederation had been already twice conceived by people among the Atlantic tribes, and failed only because of its being too late in execution to exert any influence. In the only history of the New England confederations, where King Philip's war threatened total annihilation to the English, and, in later times, when Tecumseh rallied the tribes, and fought the last good fight of the savage against the white man. In both of these aboriginal schemes of union, the lack of success arose simply from their having been devised too late, when the whites were become too powerful to resist.

Pomfret had listened to the earnest words of his friend Zumozin, with a countenance that showed how fully he appreciated the noble impulses which gave birth to them; and he rejoined with a glistening eye;

"Captin', you're a brick, an' deserve to be President o' this ere dod-rotted republic in jes' about no time, now I tell ye. Ef you want to bring about the real elevation o' yaller-skins, jes' you larn 'em to respect themselves, and make 'em feel that an Ingin's good as a white man, if he's decent. A man's a man, and by jingo, they owned the land before any white feller ever set foot on't. 'Tain't fair to drive 'em clean out o' their own shanties, by thunder."

"Let us hope that the age of persecution is passing away," said Padre Herrata. "No nation is secure that is intolerant."

"True as gospel," ejaculated the Yankee. "But what course will our new government take, if it be true that Paredes is to have dictatorial authority?"

"I know not that such authority will be allowed him," answered Padre Herrata, "but this we must expect—war on the part of the United States, and civil war in Mexico."

"And who will wage the civil war?"

"A dozen ambitious chieftains, anxious for power—men who could be controlled but by one master-spirit, popular alike with the people and the army."

"You mean Santa Anna."

"You understand me, Anselmo. But, alas! the General dwells ingloriously abroad, when his country demands his services here."

"He hates the Americans!"

"More bitterly even than Paredes, who, besides, is not popular with the soldiers. If we would avert civil war, Santa Anna must return."

"But how? His life might be the forfeit. Remember Iturbide and Guerrero."

"The army will protect him, and Paredes must yield the command of that, in order to secure himself from a host of jealous rivals."

"It is true—Santa Anna must return."

"Go then, Anselmo, at once to Vera Cruz, as was your intention. Embark for Havana, where Santa Anna now waits, and tell him that his presence is needed in México. He will return with you."

"But if in the mean time war should break out?"

"What better service can you accomplish, my son, than to bring another defender to our country? Santa Anna is ambitious; but ambition in one man is better than anarchy and disunion among all our chiefs. Anselmo, follow my counsel, as you love Mexico! Señor Pomfret and myself leave at once for the frontier. Go you at once to Santa Anna."

"I will, my father!" cried Zumozin, rising and taking the priest's hand. "Farewell! we shall soon meet again. And you, my brave American," continued the Mexican youth as Pomfret came forward for a parting embrace, "if all your nation and all my countrymen were just and loyal as yourself, the name of war would never be breathed in their councils. Farewell, my friend, and may we yet greet each other under less gloomy auspices."

With these words, Zumozin departed, leaving his two friends to arrange all things for their contemplated journey from the capital. In the mean time, we must return to other actors in our drama of history and life.

The news of Taylor's occupation of the eastern bank of the Rio Grande had just reached the capital of Mexico, and had been made the subject of a public proclamation which was placarded throughout the city. It was considered as the initiative of war. Whatever might have been the numbers or vitality of the peace party of Mexico a few weeks before, ere yet Herrera's administration had succumbed to the demands of popular belligerency, there was very little manifestation of pacific feeling by an assemblage at the market-place. All lips breathed hostility to the invader, albeit some were pale in so doing. Anathemas without stint were hurled at the perfidious nation which, it was asserted, had wantonly provoked and pushed to extremity the quarrel, in the lust for aggrandizement and territory. Many priests mingled with the laymen of the crowd, exhorting the latter to die, if necessary, in their country's defense, and to pay out their last dollar to support a righteous cause; but none of these religious gentlemen offered of themselves to furnish contributions, though it was well known that the revenues of the State were insignificant compared with those of the church. However, if wanting in liberality, the good clergy lacked not in zeal, and dispensed the blessings of the church very generously, if they did not its funds.

Aside from the crowd, conversing in an animated manner, walked two individuals with whom the reader is already acquainted. They did not appear to be so much occupied with the general subject of excitement, as with their own personal matters.

"By St. Iago! whoever this villain of an American be, I shall not sleep well till I triumph over him," muttered the younger of the two colloquists, clinching his teeth as he spoke, and frowning ominously.

"You have your father's temper, Falcone," cried his companion. "But who and what is this American?"

"I know nothing of him, farther than that he rendered some service to the late administration, and was in favor with Herrera. He is called Señor Pomfret, and rumor says, he assisted in dispersing the brigand band of Joaquín Marani, some time since; a bold fellow, that Marani, who attacked a government caudillo not long before he was taken."

"And a priest, Padre Herrata—was not such a one mentioned in connection with the capture of Marani?"

"You know all about it."

"Doubtless! I have a good memory, and readily recall the circumstance. Moreover, I will tell you something else. The government caudillo which the brigand attacked was desired, if captured, to supply the troops of General Pareja, then in revolt. This American and the priest, by preventing the plunder, saved Herrera's government from pecuniary ruin. You understand me, Falcone?"

"I think so."

"Consequently Herrera became a friend to both the worthy gentlemen. But that is no reason Paredes should remember them with gratitude. You understand me now, Falcone?"

"Perfectly, Don Ricardo."

"Your path, then, is open. Paredes knows you for his friend, and will give you full authority as regards not only this American and the priest, but us to all connected with them. Doubtless you understand me now, my dear Gabriel Falcone."

Don Ricardo laughed in his singular manner, as he quietly gave utterance to those words, the effect of which on his hearer was powerful. Falcone stopped short in his walk, and seized his associate's hand.

"Don Ricardo," he cried, "you are the devil, I believe, for knowing every thing. I see clearly what you would have me do, and will at once to the President."

"He will give you a commission, doubtless, which you can turn to account, my dear Gabriel. But, now, a word with you. This lovely maiden, Ginton's sister—she will very probably require new protection. Would she scorn to accept my hospitality till—"

Falcone looked in Don Ricardo's face, and marked the hidden meaning of his covert glance.

"You know she will be perfectly safe under my roof," continued Don Ricardo.

Falcone smiled in response to the sardonic expression of his companion.

"And perfectly at home," pursued Don Ricardo.

Again the two men exchanged smiles.

"And you will be quite at home, likewise, you are aware, Gabriel."

There was no need of further interchange of glance or smile, the two schemers understood each other as well as if hours had been expended in mutual explanation.

CHAPTER XI.

THE PASS OF RIO PRIO.

THE lofty summits of the Anahuac Cordilleras glittered in the full blaze of noonday sun, like shafts of gold or emerald, and a thousand streams skirting their declivities, belted the plains as with ribbons of shining silver. On a lofty point on the main highway leading from the city of Mexico downward toward the coast and the eastern provinces, a small cavalcade had just halted, as if to rest, ascending one of the most difficult hills upon the route.

The leading persons of the party were two,—halting their horses on the highest ridge of the elevated road, looked into each other's eyes and with that mute communion revealed a world of thought. These two were a youth attired in a riding suit of black, and a young girl clad in garments of the same somber hue. They drew their horses near, side by side, and the young man, as with an involuntary impulse, clasped his companion's ungloved hand which lightly held the bridle of her palfrey, and pressed it in his own, while their mutual gaze dwelt upon the magnificent panorama beneath them.

Silence seemed indeed the fitting tribute to such a glorious scene as was mapped before their vision—silence which allows the heart to drink deeply of the spirit of beauty, until the overwrought feelings gush in tears. But a voice, low and earnest, from one of two horse-men, who followed immediately the youth and maiden, broke thrillingly upon their ears.

“It is a land to live and to die for!”

“Truly, truly, Father Herrata—a land blessed by Heaven!” replied the young girl, turning her face toward the first speaker, its lovely features illumined with deep interest.

“Ah! that men should desecrate such a land!” cried the young man beside her; “that injustice and oppression make it necessary for men to die in defense of a region so beautiful. Why can not peace abide where all is so peace-inspiring? Why must war enter here?”

“Would that it might be prevented!” said Padre Herrata, solemnly. "Would to Heaven we had yielded that unfortunate territory of Texas, which your people," addressing Pomfret, "have so long coveted. And doubtless had Herrera been firmly established in authority—had he not been threatened so long by Parral—a negotiation would have been effected without difficulty. But the popular voice is for war—it clamors at Parral because he does not at once take the field. What can we look for when the two republics breathe defiance, and thirst for one another's blood?"

The Yankee was about to speak, when an exclamation from the young girl, Teresa, whose gaze had been directed back toward the city, caused the whole party suddenly to turn their heads. At first they looked anxiously for their attendants, Hammett, Little and a couple of half-breed Mexicans, who, with the pack-mules, were slowly toiling up the hill which they themselves, riding fast, had ascended somewhat in advance. Nothing seemed to be apprehended concerning them, but an appearance lower down fixed their attention and of once filled them with forebodings of evil. A cloud of dust upon the road indicated the approach of mounted men, who, from the speed with which they urged their horses on the unsheltered road exposed to the direct heat of the sun, were evidently in pursuit of some one in advance.

"Who are those men and fellows?" cried Padre Herrera. "Those are government soldiers, doubtless sent to recall us. Let us to our speed at once."

"Or fight it out here—which shall it be, padre?" asked Pomfret, calmly examining the priming of a horse-pistol which he drew from one of his holsters.

"We can not resist—there are too many," answered the priest. "But try the speed of our horses, and those males could ill resist being pulled forward. But stay—there is a better plan. Before us, some a quarter of a mile, the road diverges, to strike again at the base of your far range of hills. Let Hammett and the mules pursue the left, while we press forward on the right. We shall be followed by the pursuers, if such they be. Oh, now, my children, while I direct the good Hammett on his course, and inform him where to halt and await us. His road is direct, ours circuitous. Fly, my children!"

Saying this, Padre Herrata dropped behind to communicate with Hannibal, while the rest of the party, spurring their horses, dashed at once down the slope of the road, and plunged amid the thick woods that skirted either side. Alonzo Vallojo, riding close to Teresa, kept a watchful eye upon her mounted steed, and the Yankee, having satisfied himself that his pistols were in good condition, kept close behind, at the same time keeping his head half turned about to catch the first glimpse of pursuers on their headlong track.

Thus, through the vasted length of shady forests and out upon the open fields, and over slope and acclivity, the three riders kept their way. A gallop of ten minutes carried them far down the mountain terraces, but they still preserved unabatedly the speed with which they had started. Suddenly the quick ear of Pomfret detected the sound of a horse's hoofs clattering behind, and presently a single steed, mounted by a female, came flying after the fugitives.

"What on airth hev ye done with yer mule? Where's the padre?" were Pomfret's rapidly uttered questions, as, wheeling about in his saddle, without drawing bridle, he recognized the mulatto, Lucille, who had now arrived abreast of him.

"Mai diu! I am killed—of me there is no more," exclaimed the girl, almost gasping for breath, while the excitement of the race reddened her yellow visage. "The padre—he is not here—un altro cavallo—he has my mule. O ciao! Mam'selle, I am ready to die with the fatigue."

Teresa looked back inquiringly to Lucille, who, with a great effort, for the speed with which she had followed the party had almost exhausted her strength, managed to explain that Padre Herrata had exchanged his horse for the mule on which she was riding, and bidden her to press forward to join her mistress, while he, with Hannibal and the other attendants, should make at once for the Pass of Rio Frio, and there await the arrival of his friends.

"Rio Frio?" cried Teresa; "but where is that pass?"

"I know the place very well," answered Pomfret. "And if you want to drink some of the coolest water that ever flowed out of a natural ice-house, jes' wait till we get to Rio Frio. I've been there afore now, I tell ye, and in good company, too. And I tell you Miss Terezy—if any thing ever did baffle me, 'twas to know how in time such ternal cold water comes out of a volcano! Jerusalem! it's like the old chap in King's face, that blowed hot and cold at the same time. But he's past all and keep movin', miss. There ain't no time to lose."

At that portion of the great national road which the party were now descending, the mountains rose steeply on every side, and many volcanic peaks were visible at various points of the horizon. The highway was broad and well beaten, and sheltered from the sun's rays by wooded hills, rising continually, between which could be caught, at intervals, a view of some little lake filling a hollow which perhaps was once a crater's bed, and worn upon the green mountain side like a silver boulder on a giant's arm. They were now more than ten thousand feet above the level of the sea, having, since leaving the city of Mexico on the day previous, ascended about three thousand feet and traveled nearly forty miles. Twenty of these, however, had been ridden since daybreak that morning, consequently it became important that they should speedily reach a place of rest and security, or abandon all hope of escape.

Meanwhile they urged their flagging horses down the hills at a pace which was hazardous in the extreme. Vallejo's right hand held a rein of Teresa's horse, while he guided his own with the left, and the Yankee performed the same office for the sick Llanero. Fortunately, all the company were good riders, and their animals well trained to mountain travel, so that no mishap interrupted their adventurous course. Conversation, however, was impossible, for all attention became absorbed in the contemplation of their position, and nothing was heard on that lonely road—lonely, because the midday is voided for travel—but the sharp clatter of the horses' hoofs, echoed from the hard calcareous on both sides of the road, and down the deep chinks of solid basalt.

At present Rio Frio was before them—Rio Frio, a small mountain town, the nucleus of the country, the capital, and the only place of refuge. Far up the road it are the bases of the great mountain ranges whose summits guard forever the snows that fall upon them. Ledges and walls of porphyry rise abruptly, one above another, to incredible heights all over this region, and from bastions, as it were, through which the road winds in a narrow channel to which the streamlet has given the name of Cold River-Pass. Here a small force might probably resist successfully the passage of an army, for the locality and natural defenses make the position a sort of Thermopyke; as it is the gateway of the loftiest ridge of all the Cordillera chain below the city of Mexico, and only a few miles beneath the point of prospect over all the surrounding country.

The route of the fugitives pointed toward Puebla, and till reaching that city, they had intended journeying by easy stages. Consequently, though traveling that day since the earliest light, they had, at the moment when alarmed by pursuers, accomplished less than forty miles from the capital, scarcely half the distance to the plain of Cholula, on which Puebla stands. But the fear of capture made a great difference in their rate of progress, and the last eight miles had been traversed in an exceedingly brief space of time. Rio Frio was now at hand, where doubtless the mule-party, which had traveled by a shorter cut, would be found awaiting their approach.

But when Rio Frio was reached, no mule-party—no Padre Herrata or Hannibal were to be seen. Pomfret and Vallejo looked at each other in silence, fearing to give voice to the apprehensions which obtruded upon their minds. Teresa observed their uncertainty.

"They may have delayed—they may have rested."

"Rather doubtful," responded the Yankee. "Padre Herrata ain't the man to stop when he's got started; and the road they took was clean three miles shorter than our'n. I'm kind o' scared about the party—fix' it?"

"Could they have been interrupted?" asked Vallejo.

"Wall, to tell the real truth, I've been sort o' dubious for some time about findin' the padre at Rio Frio. You see, if the fellows had followed us, we'd had some signs o' chasin' afore now. 'Steal o' that, we hain't seen a hooter of anybody behind us since we first sot out on a run. Now my 'pinion is that they've hunted the padre instead of our party, and as the mules couldn't travel fast with their packs, they've jes' overhauled 'em, and captured the hull—"

"Listen! that's surely the sound of horses' feet," cried Teresa, suddenly raising her finger to impose silence.

Her companions listened, and in a moment detected the noise of hoofs, very faint and apparently distant, but evidently advancing at a rapid pace along the lower road by which the mules should have arrived ere now.

"I hear 'em—I do so," cried Pemfret. "And they ain't no male horses either. It's just as I expected. The 'tarnal yaller-skins have got the packs, and now they're in hot chase after us. Miss Teresa—Señor Vallojo—I guess we'll have to knock under, this time."

"No! let us defend ourselves," exclaimed Alonzo.

"Can't be done—they're too many for us," returned the Yankee, loosening his pistols in their holsters as he spoke, and sliding the handle of a large knife which he wore in his belt, so as to bring it nearer his hand. There was a look of quiet determination on Pemfret's countenance which gave assurance to his companions, even while he declared the uselessness of defense.

"We've got to play ligua," remarked the North American, with a twinkle of his gray eye.

"What do you mean, Señor?"

"Why, just take to the woods, and trust to Providence," returned Pemfret. "Don't say another word, one o' ye, but follow your leader, and we'll look out for chances."

Saying this, Pemfret grasped the bridle of Lucille's horse, as he had done before, and without more ado led the way, by turning on the banks of the stream, and plunging into the thick forest which skirted the mountains that here shelved steeply over the narrow road. In a moment more, Rio Frio was deserted, but from the lower road could now be heard distinctly the measured and rapid sound of an approaching party of horse.

CHAPTER XII.

TERESA'S ESCAPE.

MEANWHILE, as divined by Pomfret, the mule-party had been overtaken and captured. Padre Herrata, after joining Hannibal and hastily giving him orders to await his mistress at the Rio Frio pass, was about to follow his friends immediately, when he was accosted by the mulatto, Lucille, who begged to accompany him to her mistress, leaving to Hannibal the care of the mules.

"Oh, padre maldito!" cried Lucille, "what we shall do without one another? Each will be lost. Let me go, Padre Herrata."

"Truly, child, your place is with your mistress," answered the good priest; "but you ride a mule; it can not keep up with the horses,"

"Oh, non dico!" what will become of me?" cried the girl.

Padre Herrata glanced backward from the light which the mules had now reached, and beheld the pursuing party skirting the precipice beneath, at a pace which would soon bring them up the winding road. He decided immediately what course to take.

"Dismount," said he, quickly, to the mulatto, at the same time springing from his own horse. "We will exchange animals. Gallop forward and overtake your mistress: I will mount the mule and go on with Hannibal. We shall stop at the Rio Frio pass. Away, my girl!"

Lucille needed no second command. In an instant more the exchange was effected, and the mulatto dashed down the mountain in pursuit of her mistress, while Padre Herrata, besailing the mule, said quietly to Hannibal:

"It is doubtless for the best; now let us press forward quickly."

The negro, who cherished great respect for the padre, raised the mules, five in number, with his two fellow-attendants bringing up the rear, and thus disposed, the party diverged suddenly from the main road, and clattered swiftly down the more direct, but rough and difficult road that led to the Paso del Rio Frio. Padre Herrata and Hannibal led the way, while the two attendants, riding on either side, and grasping the head of the heavily-laden pack-mule, followed as fast as they were able. Behind them, as they descended the rocky pass-way, they heard the clatter of horses' hoofs suddenly cease, and knew that the pursuing company had gained the crest of the ridge they had just left, and were doubtless halting to reconnoitre that point, as we have before noticed, affording an excellent prospect over the lower plain.

Padre Herrata knew that, if pursued vigorously by the party behind, his own had little chance of escape; but he trusted to reaching the Rio Frio before being overtaken, in which event he relied on being able to elude immediate capture, and perhaps to rescue his friends entirely, by abandoning the mules to the two Indians and Hannibal, under conduct of Pomfret, and then to ride back upon the main road with Vallejo and the Mexicans in order to parley with the enemy and thus give time to the fugitives to escape. He knew the Yankee to be well acquainted with all the country around Puebla, and trusted in his courage and discretion to protect his charge, while himself and Vallejo, being Spaniards, could not be in danger of much beyond capture and imprisonment, even if the pursuers should prove to be, as he feared, vindictive personal enemies.

But the priest, in this calculation, had no thought of the probability of the lower and dangerous ravine road being taken by those behind. Such, however, it became very soon evident was the case, for hardly had the mules advanced a mile when the clatter of horses was heard above, and Padre Herrata at once knew that the mules and not the horses would be first overtaken. At first, this conviction was gratifying to the priest, promising, as it did, a means of delaying their enemies, and thus affording better opportunity of escape to Teresa and her escort. But he reflected immediately that the pack-mules carried all the plunder, apparel and necessaries of the party, and that, if overtaken, as he had anticipated Rio Frio as the place of rendezvous, it was quite probable that his friends might there await his coming, which must of course result in their capture. Padre Herrata was almost in despair, for he saw no method of extrication from this new danger; but nevertheless, the priest was quick to resolve and prompt to execute, and he seized a forlorn hope.

"Hannibal!" he cried, "take the bridle of the pack-mule and push forward on the straight road, at your speed, till you reach your mistress. Then say to Señor Pomfret that we are taken, and he must escape as he can. Do you understand, Hannibal?"

"Yes, massa. I'm to 'scape 'long wi' Massa Pomfret, and you is to be cotched."

"Away, then, and do your best."

Hannibal seized the mule's bridle and urged his own forward at its utmost speed, while Padre Herrata, addressing the mestizoes, bade them turn their mules and follow him. Hannibal, the negro, looked back once and beheld a cloud of dust as his late companions disappeared in a curve of the ascent, and then pushed forward as rapidly as possible. The road was rough and uneven, and the sharp points of the porphyritic rocks caused even the mules, sure-footed as they were, to hesitate in some portions of the rugged way. But Hannibal, intent on reaching his mistress, took note neither of danger nor difficulty, lashing his beast with a short leathern thong which he carried, and using various inducements of voice and hand to accelerate the animal's motion.

"Gorra! you creep, you son of a jack, you!" ejaculated the negro. "Why for you no run like horse? 'Spees I gits off, 'fore long—go alone. Come up, ole mi-sis—no time for go to sleep yeah."

By dint of such admonitions, Hannibal managed to infuse considerable energy into his long-eared steeds, and they ascended and descended the rocky paths with unabated celerity till the pass of Rio Frio, with its high walls of mountain on either side, was at last reached. But to Hannibal, unacquainted with the appointed place of meeting, the little stream that gushed by the road presented no inducements to pause. His mistress and her companions were nowhere to be seen, and the padre had directed him to push forward till he reached them. Consequently he stopped not at Rio Frio, save for a moment to breathe his mules, but plunged downward once more and entered in the narrow intricacies of the pass beneath.

Thus it happened that, when in a very brief space after Hannibal's passing the stream, the horses of his mistress and her party reached the same spot, no traces of the negro were visible. The road was too rocky to receive any indentation from the feet of mules, so Pomfret and the others remained in ignorance of the two earnest servants having missed them; and therefore, only perceiving to be sure they were still pursued, the fugitives, as we have seen, departed from the highway and plunged into the woody detiles on the right of the Rio Frio.

The sun was now declining, for the day had worn some two hours since the time when our travelers had contemplated so calmly the grand panorama of the valley of Mexico, outspread beneath their gaze. On the unsheltered road, the heat and glare were still, it is true, almost unbearable; but when, diverging from the pass, our party reached the velvet carpet of a succession of secluded glades, and felt themselves borne over the grassy turf, without the sound of a hoof upon its springy bed, and when, coolly from its mountain openings, a delicious breeze came to refresh both riders and steeds, the sudden transition seemed like enchantment, and the woodlands through which they advanced might have passed for the borders of fairy regions.

But the green glades and unobstructed forest-openings soon gave place to difficult and devious paths, as the horses began to descend the mountain terrace on which they had entered from the highway, and became involved in the thick growth of underwood and clumps of cactus, interspersed with palms and dwarfed oaks. The ground began to be uneven and dangerous, sharp volcanic fragments protruding constantly, from beds of lava and heaps of slag. It now became impossible to keep the saddle, and Vallojo assisted Teresa to alight, while Pomfret, gathering the horses in single file, led them through tangled brakes and down the difficult slopes, always contriving to discover the most practicable pathway.

Thus proceeding for some hours, they penetrated the wilderness so far as to be quite uncertain regarding either course or progress. The loss of Pedro Herrera and Hannibal, with the unexplained and much uneasiness; but Teresa confided greatly in the firmness and resolution of her countryman, Pomfret, whom Providence, it appeared, had sent to be a protector in her hour of trial. Nor was the maiden insensible to the chivalric attentions of Alonzo Vallejo, whose whole anxiety seemed to be for her safety and comfort. The youth, indeed, was not one to remain unnoticed by a lady's eye. His form was graceful, yet sinewy, his manner courteous, and his noble features, naturally pale, were now flushed with exertion, and perhaps the happier of serving the fair American. Many a romantic young lady might have been glad to travel with such a cavalier as Vallejo; though none, perhaps, could have complained less than she did of the hardships encountered—of brambles, rough cactus, and stony soil, tearing her garments and wounding her tender feet, albeit a manly arm lifted her lightly over the most difficult obstacles. There she suffered, but smiled, as she kept on, glad to escape what she dreaded far worse, her unscrupulous Mexican pursuers.

At length the yellow sunbeams began to slant across the foliage, and, much to their joy, the rugged ground gave way to breaks of level sward and trees less tangled with undergrowth. It was evident that water was near, for the grass grew greener and the cactus clumps disappeared; and presently they gained an opening in the forest which ushered them abruptly on a luxuriant glade, so quiet and lovely, that their first glimpse of it made them forget the fatigues of the march.

It was an invitation to halt and repose. Pomfret, without speaking, proceeded to unbuckle the trappings, and remove the saddles from the horses, allowing the weary animals to crop the rich grass. Then turning to his companions, our Yankee addressed them in his quaint way:

"My friends, we've had considerable of an Ingen trail this afternoon, and it's my 'pinion we've got about as far as sundown, anyhow."

"And what do you propose to do now, Mr. Pomfret?" asked Teresa.

"Camp down, I reck'n, and git a good night's lodgin' before we tackle up again, miss—"

"Remain here?"

"Well, now, we might look a smart spell farder, and find things a sight wus, Miss Teresy. This 'ere interval's cut out by natur' as a campin'-down spot; and I callate Squire Vallejo and myself can fix up a wigwam for you as good as Princess Pocahontas ever had, now I tell you."

"I have every confidence in you, Mr. Pomfret," responded Teresa.

"There, now, thank you, miss; and see if we don't make a real lady's chamber for you, bless your heart," replied Pomfret. "And first of all, before the sun goes down, I want to show you about where we are, friends. Jes' look up there." The Yankee pointed, as he said this, through a gap in the overhanging branches of trees, and the eyes of Alonzo and Teresa followed his motion. They could discover nothing, however, but a succession of shelving precipices towering above.

"Jes' look sharp," cried Pomfret. "Cast your eyes up straight ahead to that mountain-top, and see if you can't sight a white spot, lookin' like a tarnation cro'-nest. Well, now, I tell ye, that's the diential ridge we crossed, jes' 'fore them yaller-skins come on full chase arter us."

"Surely," exclaimed Vallejo, "we can not have descended from that altitude."

"Fae'," replied Pomfret. "Nothin' short o' two thousand feet, if it's a hair; and what's more, we've traveled a dozen miles, cross-hairs, since you and I stood on that 'ere cro'-nest. You see the great natural road winds down the mounting side about ten miles away from this, and goes a-skirtin' the foot-hills to Puebla."

"How far are we, then, from Puebla?" asked Alonzo.

"Hard on to thirty miles, nigh as I can guess," answered the Yankee; "but, there's a friend o' mine and Padre Herrata's nearer than that, where we can put up a spell. But I reckon a like o' somthin' wouldn't hurt any on us about now," continued Pomfret, as he proceeded to the saddle-bags, and began to take from them several articles provided by his forethought. "Here's some fire, and a box o' sardines, squire, and there's a flask o' real super wine, no discount, now I tell ye. Miss Teresa, we've got some sugar-tamarinds and pound-cake, that'll jes' do—any quantity; and there's a brook under yonder bush, singin' away like a tea-kettle. Bat, for' sakes, Señor Vallejo, you and I musn't forgit the wigwam. Here, Lucille, you jes' fix up tea, and the squire and me 'll 'tend to other chores. Come along, Señor."

Alonzo hastened to emulate the Yankee, in making himself useful, and the twain, penetrating the thick wood, soon collected a mass of green boughs and favorite foliage, with which they returned loaded to the camp. Meantime, Lucille assisted her mistress to prepare a tempting repast, which was spread upon the sweet grass, under the soft haze of twilight. The young men on their part, aided specially by Pomfret's jack-knife, began to build an arbor for Teresa between four symmetric trees, which offered graceful support, while, crossing and interweaving the fragrant materials into an impervious roof, they joined it to the long undergrowth of vines, disposing the sides, like drapery, in festoons and looped tendrils. A quantity of variegated wild flowers, rich with perfume, peeped tastefully out from the enameled curtains, and beneath all was the velvet verdure, soft as a downy couch. Altogether, our artificers created a bower that astonished and delighted her for whose shelter it was intended.

After discussing the supper, securing the horses, and inspecting all surroundings, Pomfret reclined with Vallojo on the turf, enjoying their cigars, while Teresa returned with Lucille to her sylvan dormitory. The night was passed in alternate watches by the gentlemen; and when the first rays of the sun began to slope over the mountains, Pomfret was up, with horses ready for the road. Teresa came forth, rosy and beautiful, to tell of her calm repose, and Vallojo, like a true knight, hastened to arrange every thing for her traveling comfort. A draught of sparkling water from the running water near, brought in a goblet which emanated, like every other necessary, from Pomfret's saddle-bags, with some tamarind conserve and crisp white crackers, tempted Teresa's appetite; while her escort contented themselves each with a cup of wine before putting foot in saddle. Then they all rode away, in the mellow atmosphere of morning, inhaling a thousand sweets from the wooded plain, then robed in all the freshness of spring. Pomfret talked of adventures connected with the neighboring hills, which were noted in Mexican story for many wild exploits of brigands and other outlaws; and as for Alonzo Vallojo, riding through cool glades, over mounds of green turf, from which the eye could catch glimpses of a broad river flowing between fields and hills, he, we may be sure, as he looked on Teresa, sighed to think such romantic journeying must ever be ended.

At length, emerging from mountain declivities, the party entered on a beaten road which Pomfret conjectured must connect to the national highway from Mexico to Puebla de los Angeles. The path, however, was still narrow and sequestered, though signs of husbandry multiplied as they advanced. On the route, the previous afternoon, no vegetation, save that of nature's rank distribution, had met their observation, but now they were greeted with all varieties of cultivated products flourishing in this luxuriant portion of Mexico. Pomfret recognized on all sides the grains of northern climes; tender blades of wheat just starting from the generous soil, and blended with more rugged leaves of corn and barley; while here and there, as in his own New England home, were clumps of blooming apple-trees, whose familiar perfumes were wafted to him like memories of childhood. Teresa, as she glanced at the Yankee, who was quite silent, fancied that she saw a tear moistening his eyes, and a pensive shadow softening his sharp features; but the next moment Patnam Pomfret uttered a loud "Ah-ha!" and began to whistle vigorously the air of "Hail Columbia."

The long, the white walls of a hacienda, embowered in woods, that crowned an eminence on their left, attracted the gaze of Teresa and Alonzo. It was evidently the abode of refinement, perhaps luxury, for the travellers, peering toward it through intervals of the well-trimmed trees, caught glimpses of statues gleaming amid the green, like wood-nymphs, while the falling drop of fountains tinkled on the aromatic air that seemed to blow from gardens.

"A beautiful dwelling-place," cried Vallejo, in admiration, as the house came more fully into view, with its balconies commanding a terrace immediately over them, its jalousied casements over-run with honeysuckles and clematis and rose, almost hiding the porch and open door.

"Lovely, indeed!" responded Teresa, sighing, as she thought how she had often pictured such a home to be shared with her brother, when fortune should have smiled upon him. And that brother—alas!

"Well, esquire," cried Patnam Pomfret, abruptly pulling brille, "we might as well put up and bait. I'm nation sure there's somethin' to eat here; and folks as good as they're handsome, now I tell ye."

Saying this, Pomfret turned from the road, through a grassy lane, which, winding at the base of the terrace, conducted upward to the mansion. On either side was a hedge of woodbine, whose delicious aroma made the air honey. Extending beyond, were orchards thick with blossoms, and fields of new-springing grain. Around the cottage were a piazza and balcony, and every casement was covered with roses and flowers. Approaching the rosy portal, Pomfret dismounted and gave his hand to Teresa, while at the same moment two figures appeared, apparently the master and mistress of the hacienda.

"Don Lorenzo, I s'pose you don't forgit an old friend," was the salutation of Pomfret to the young and smiling gentleman, who advanced first.

"Señor Pomfret! welcome! a thousand welcomes!" was the hearty response, with extended hand. "How happy is this meeting! And your friends, Señor?"

"We shall be acquainted, Don, double-quick, now I tell you," cried Pomfret, proceeding to introduce his companions to the host, who, in turn, presented them to his wife, a charming creature, in the flush of mirthful beauty, who embraced Teresa warmly, kissing her lips with true womanly frankness.

"Don Lorenzo, if you and your wife, Señora Inez, ain't matched jes' like two roses on a stein, then there's no sich thing as harmony in music," cried Pomfret. "It warms up my heart to see you smiling so, I'm e'enmost like to cry. God bless both on ye!"

So saying, Putnam Pomfret took Vallejo's arm, and followed his hostess into the cottage, whither Teresa had already been conducted by its gentle mistress.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE WOUNDED PADRE.

PADRE HERRATA, after enjoining Hannibal to make all haste in overtaking his mistress, rode back, the reader knows, in company with the Mestizoes to meet his prisoner. Arrived within speaking distance, he drew rein at the abrupt command of their leader, and remained motionless, with severe countenance and placid demeanor. The Mestizo lackeys, checking their mules, remained behind.

Gabriel Falcone, flaming with rage, rode up to the priest, and leveled a pistol at his head.

"Traitorous friar! where are the others of your party?"

"All of my party you can see before you, Señor."

"Tis a lie! Where is that foreign spy and his female accomplices, for whose arrest I bear the order of General Paroles? Answer without evasion, priest, or I'll blow out your plotting brains on the spot."

"Have you warrant for that, also, my son?" asked Padre Herrata, preserving his equanimity.

"By the Lord! you will learn, if you refuse to answer my questions. Where are the Americans?"

"They have journeyed another road than this," answered the priest.

"Another road—beware!"

"I speak truth, my son. Those whom you seek have taken the upper road, leaving myself and the twain behind me to be hunted by your especial pursuit."

These words, uttered very quietly, inflamed Falcone's anger to the last point. "Villainous monk!" he shouted, rising firmly in his saddle, and, pressing the trigger of the pistol with which he had not ceased to threaten the priest, he discharged it full at the latter's breast.

Padre Herrata raised his hand to his head, lifted his eyes a moment toward heaven, and then fell heavily from his mule upon the dust of the road.

As the pistol exploded the Mexican soldiers who formed

Falcone's troop uttered a cry of dismay, and hardly had the friar fallen before two or three of the rough fellows sprung from their saddles and knelt beside the prostrate body. Gabriel Falcone glared at them savagely, and rode toward the Mestizo servants, who shrunk in their seats under his menacing regards.

"Where are your masters, dogs? Speak, or you swing from the boughs above you."

The Mestizoes averted their eyes only to fix them on the neighboring trees, which offered such convenient substitutes for the gallows. Then, with one accord, both slid to the ground, groveling before the wrathful Mexican.

"O, por amor de Dios! Señor, we are innocent. We are poor devils of servants not worth a rope."

"Answer me, then—where are your master and mistress?"

"Los Americanos?" cried the nearest.

"El Señor Pomfret?" gasped the other wretch.

"Yes—what of him? And the Señora? Speak, you dogs, or I'll hang you at once."

"O illustrissimo! The padre spoke truth. Los Americanos have taken the upper road. 'Tis a league back, Locallaza, they turned off."

"Perdition!" roared Falcone, spurring his horse, and riding down the miserable Mestizoes. Then, wheeling round, he fronted the soldiers, several of whom had lifted Padre Herrata in their arms, and were stanching the wound in his breast.

"Is the traitor dead?" demanded the young man, with an oath. But, instead of a reply from the soldier, he heard a general murmur, which boded insubordination among the rest.

"Do you hear me, sirrah? Is the man dead?"

"The holy priest still breathes," answered the soldier. "It is not quite a murder."

Captain Falcone—for he now held that rank by commission from the new President—bit his lips, and gave the order to remount.

"What shall we do with the wounded padre?" asked another soldier.

"To the devil with—ha! will ye mount, or are ye, too traitors and rebels?"

"We are neither, Captain," responded the man. "But all the world knows Padre Herrata is a friend to Mexico, and to her soldiers. He has shared bread with the soldiers, and a curse would rest on us did we leave him to die in the highway."

These words were spoken with a dogged earnestness which convinced Falcone that it would be unsafe to irritate his refractory followers. Intimidation of such men, accustomed to loose discipline, was out of the question; so, stifling his rage, he yielded to necessity, and gave permission to the soldiers, assisted by the Mestizoes, to construct a litter, wherein to transport the wounded and insensible priest.

And thus, instead of capturing the fair Teresa, and revenging himself on her protectors, Captain Gabriel Falcone now found himself constrained to retrace his steps to the capital. Cursing his evil temper, which had led him to commit the rash act of shooting a priest, and one, moreover, as he soon learned from the conversation of his gloomy soldiers, who was known and beloved among the people, the new officer took his descending way to the gates of Mexico, where he arrived at the edge of evening. The two Mestizoes were speedily conveyed to the guard-house, and Padre Herrata, reported as a wounded prisoner, to the hospital; after which Falcone divested himself of his road-stained military trappings, and set out to seek his friend Don Ricardo Ramos, just at the hour when Patnam Pomfret and Alonzo Vallejo were busy in the construction of that romantic bower in which, as we have already seen, the beautiful Teresa passed her quiet wildwood night.

CHAPTER XIV.

FALCONE'S FORAY.

AN atmosphere of happiness reigned in and around the hacienda of Lorenzo and Inez, the gentle entertainers of Pomfret and his two companions. Lorenzo, possessed of ample means, and warmly seconded in his tastes by the devotion of his lovely wife, had surrounded their beautiful home with all that could contribute to the gratification of true artistic taste, or enhance the pure pleasures of domestic life. The mansion itself, embowered in fragrant woodlands, and redolent with the perfume and grace of the flowers which encompassed its every border, was a fit dwelling-place for hearts inspired with mutual love, and charming as the seat of freely-dispensed charity and enlarged hospitality. The master and mistress of that hacienda, though mingling little in the world beyond their threshold, were yet known and esteemed by high and low through all the cultivated neighborhood, which stretched from the main road nearest to their gates, downward through the luxuriant "Valley of Murillo," named after the father of Lorenzo's bride, a rich proprietor, and around the base of the lofty "Outlaw's Mount," once the retreat of a band of brigands, lately dispersed by the death of their famous leader.

Weeks fled swiftly over the heads of the three guests, and yet no tidings of the Padre Herrata, or of the missing Hannibal and the Mestizo could be gathered, though messengers had been dispatched at various times from the hacienda to the neighboring villages, and even as far off as Puebla, some miles across the plain, from the other extremity of the valley of Murillo. Pomfret grew impatient, apprehending that danger had befallen his friend the padre, and well knowing that the priest's enemies, as well as his own, were not few among the supporters of the new government. Once or twice, when no news came, he thought of leaving the hacienda, which would afford a secure retreat for his young countrywoman, and retracing his course to the capital; but a little reflection satisfied the Yankee of the futility of any aid of his, should the priest be really in the hands of powerful foes, while his own discovery might involve both himself and friends in greater peril. He resolved, therefore, to accept for a period longer the hospitality of his Mexican friends, in order to see what turn the political affairs of Mexico might take, before exposing himself to all the risks which, in the present excited state of popular feeling, an alien might encounter, even though provided with a passport of the late President, Herrera.

Meanwhile, Don Ricardo Ramos and his friend Falcone, in spite of the young Captain's unremitting efforts to discover the whereabouts of his enemy, Pomfret, and the maiden in whom he was no less interested, remained in entire ignorance of the fate of either. That they were concealed not many leagues from the capital appeared strongly probable, though the country had been scoured by spies as well as traversed by the two conspirators in every direction.

Thus passed the months, till the return of Santa Anna, the fall of Paredes and the capitulation of Monterey, followed one another in agitating the public mind. But, hardly had the latter event been chronicled by report, than intelligence more nearly affecting his desires, was communicated to Falcone. Don Ricardo roused him one morning with the information that he had at length obtained certain traces of the fugitive Teresa.

"My dear Gabriel, we have the lovely American maiden almost in our clasp."

"Explain yourself, Don Ricardo. Tell me where she is."

"Ah, you come to your senses. Well, our fair one is at a romantic hacienda, some miles this side of Puebla, where, singly concealed, she managed to baffle all our search."

"And how did you find this out?"

"By the merest accident. A silver-trader from Chihuahua, who has dealings with Señor Pomfret, and who is a talkative fellow, made acquaintance with me last night at the gaming-table. From him I learned that the Yankee had visited Puebla, in company with the proprietor of a hacienda of the neighboring valley. This was hint enough to me, and following up the trail, I have the satisfaction to inform you that Teresa is at our good pleasure, for a sudden visit, though quite secure, she fancies, from all molestation."

"And this Yankee and the youth Vallejo?"

"Are with her, it seems. But you do not fear them, surely."

"Fear!" echoed Falcone. "Not I, Don Ricardo. But this good news is overpowering. What shall we do?"

"A half-dozen stout fellows at our backs will remove whatever objections the Señora might interpose to our company—eh, Gabriel? Here you shall wed, and I will take care of her dowry. All we shall want is a priest when the Señora arrives."

"Priests are not hard to find in Mexico."

"Can we not secure our friend, the padre, whom you so nearly murdered with that unlucky shot? He is in prison still, I believe."

"He is, and recovered from his wound. These friars are tough. But this Padre Herrata is an impenetrable fellow."

"Pish! With friars one can do any thing. He has influence with your Señora, and can smooth the matter for you as no other priest could."

"That is true. I leave all in your hands."

It was at the earliest dawn of day, not long after this conversation, that the two schemers, Don Ricardo and Falcone, in company with six other horsemen, rode leisurely along the national road to a declivity which conducted to the entrance of Murillo's valley, near which was situated the hacienda of Lorenzo and Inez—that happy retreat in which Teresa had found a refuge.

The six men, who, at a word from their leader, threw themselves from the saddle, and proceeded, without confusion, to tether their steeds in such manner as to permit the animals to crop the herbage, while at the same time they should be securely confined within the thicket, were such characters as one seldom meets in quiet times or peaceful lands, but who in Mexico are too common at all seasons. Swarthy from the sun in which they bask, and with reckless passions imprinted on their lineaments, these fellows could be easily recognized as members of that lepero class which curses Spanish America as the lazzaroni does Italy. Cunning and devoid of conscience, cringing but desperate, these miserable people present a true type of degraded manhood, with its loftier impulses forgotten, and its superior intelligence brutalized. Incapable of genuine religion or sincere patriotism, these wretches are superstitiously servile to priestcraft, and the ready instruments of political demagogues. Such is the half bandit, half imbecile lepero of Mexico.

The Señora Teresa, in the seclusion of her new home, comforted by the society of her kind hostess and the poetic devotion of Alonso Vallejo, revived in a great measure from the depression into which her bereavement had thrown her. The consolations of affection are mighty; and as Teresa grew daily more sensible of Vallejo's noble qualities, she learned to esteem him more, and to feel his presence dearer, as the recollection of her lost brother became softened. Naturally, then, the maiden began once more to look forward to that radiant future which young hearts are ever disposed to weave out of the beautiful mists of their morning, which they can not believe will ever distill to tears.

Hopes and dreamings, blending sorrow with happiness, occupied Teresa's mind one lovely morning, when, leaving her friend Inez engaged in household duties, she ventured out of the garden walls attached to the hacienda, and wandered into the woodland beyond, a favorite resort of the dreamy Alonso, who, stretched beneath some branching tree, was probably indulging at this hour in reveries connected with her future and his own. She passed from the cultivated grounds, after plucking a bunch of fresh blossoms, and had entered for some time amid the solemn stillness of the woody mountain-side, when her steps were suddenly arrested by a rush in the neighboring thicket, and, ere her lips could utter a word of alarm, she found herself enveloped in a cloak, and borne swiftly through the forest intricacies. Vainly she struggled and sought to articulate a cry. It was the arm of Gabriel Falcone which gathered her muffled form to his breast, while his ruffian hand pressed the mantle over her mouth. Don Ricardo preceded the younger villain, parting the interlocking undergrowth to afford a passage, and, at intervals, assisting, without uttering a word, in managing Falcone's restive burden. Thus the abductors hurried to a sheltered thicket, where the hombres awaited them in readiness to mount and gallop away.

But the prize was not yet secured. For as the two men reached the forest-edge, and gave a signal to their myrmidons to emerge from the covert, Teresa spasmodically forced the covering from her lips, and, uttering a shriek, half smothered but still piercing in its despair, sunk, with the exertion, insensible in her kidnapper's arms. Don Ricardo vented an oath, as he rode toward the thicket, whither Falcone followed with the motionless weight he sustained. But at this moment the latter saw his path disputed by the sudden apparition of a man, whose hand grasped a lifted club. It was Alonzo Vallejo, who, doubting whether he heard Teresa's voice, had reached the spot to behold her situation. At once seizing the only weapon in his reach, a fragment of wood lying near, he precipitated himself upon the abductor, whom he recognized as his former antagonist, Falcone.

Had the gamester been a giant, he could hardly have withstood an onset like that of Vallejo, inspired for the moment with Herculean vigor. But Falcone, starting back, interposed the form of Teresa beneath the impending blow, which became fixed at once, as if paralyzed. Don Ricardo, at the same instant, discovering his comrade's danger, turned with sword in hand, and at the same time the leperos emerged from their concealment. But the undaunted Vallejo reckened not odds in defense of his Teresa. Springing aside to avoid Ricardo, he dealt the foremost lepero so sturdy a blow with his club, that he now fell prone to the earth. Then, relinquishing the unwieldy weapon, he rushed upon the fallen bravo, and with a single movement possessed himself of the sword from his hand and a pistol from his belt. Thus, suddenly armed before his surprised assailants, the brave youth fired at Don Ricardo, who fell back just in time to escape the bullet, which, grazing his cheek, buried itself in the head of a lepero behind him.

Such an unlooked-for reverse as the fall of two of their comrades in so many minutes, struck the remaining leperos with panic; and, forgetting that only one man opposed them, they turned to fly. But Don Ricardo's voice reached them. "Cowards!" he cried, "do you run from a stripling like this?" And, with a fierce malediction, he rushed upon Vallejo, who prepared to defend himself.

But it seemed now that the gallant young man was destined to end his devotion with the sacrifice of his life; for, though Falcone took no part in the conflict, there were yet five armed men opposed to one. Nevertheless, he withstood Don Ricardo's practiced assault without faltering, only taking the precaution to place his back against a tree.

"Leave the youth to me, Gabriel. Out with the horses and mount," cried Don Ricardo, hoarsely. "I will settle this little affair."

Obediently to this command, the leperos led the horses forward, while Ramos continued to press Vallejo, who, unaided in strength, felt himself momentarily sinking. Meantime, two of the leperos had lifted their prostrate comrades, one of whom was dead, while one of the remaining myrmidons mounted with Teresa on one of the horses.

"Have none of you a pistol-shot to avenge your fellows?" cried Falcone, as he sprung to his saddle, and grasped the bridle of the horse on which the maiden was secured. In answer to this appeal, a lepero leveled his pistol and fired at Alonso, who, at the same moment, received Don Ricardo's blow in his sword-arm. But at this crisis, a new arrival changed the aspect of affairs. A rush was heard suddenly in the forest, and the tall figure of Putnam Pomfret darted into the road, with the celerity of a panther.

"Just in time, yellow-skins!" shouted the North American, as his quick eye divined with a glance the position of all parties. Then dashing at Falcone, who sat on horseback next to the maid whereon two leperos were holding Teresa, he grasped the gambler's shoulders, and tore him with a violent effort to the ground. "Lie thar', ye pison serpent!" he cried, at the same time cladding in his powerful hand a heavy mallet, with which he dealt a sweeping blow upon the leperos.

"Help, Ricardo!" yelled Falcone, rolling in the dust ere he could recover himself. The older ruffian turned from Vallejo, who had fallen at the foot of the tree; but ere he could resume his antagonist, the sound of approaching feet was heard, and Lorenzo, followed by several servants of the hacienda, appeared advancing. The leperos rushed to their horses, leaving Pomfret at liberty to turn his attention to Teresa, while the two principal villains, discovering all to be lost, quickly initiated the flight of their satellites.

CHAPTER XV.

PADRE HERRATA'S FRIEND.

"TEN thousand curses on my ill luck!" cried Gabriel Falcone, as he sat with his associate, Don Ricardo, in the latter's house, about a week after their unsuccessful attempt to abduct Teresa Ginton.

"Ten thousand curses will not help the matter," responded the elder conspirator, in his cynical manner.

"What in the fiend's name is to be done, man?"

"Have patience, my good Gabriel. Meantime, go you to the Padre Herrata, and promise him whatever you please, on condition that he assists you to marry the Señora. I doubt not that, with a little priestly aid, you can soon lure the fair one to trust herself in other hands than those of her Cid, Vallejo."

"I fear this padre. He has little cause to bear good-will to me."

"Padres and women have their prices at all times. This friar's assistance is necessary. Let it be paid for, and we shall secure it."

"I will make the attempt, Don Ricardo, and report to you the result."

So saying, Falcone went home to his quarters in the castle of Chapultepec, whose strong towers defended the approaches to the capital. Here were the military schools and headquarters of the National Guards, and here resorted many of the best officers of the army reserve. Through favor of Paredes, Falcone was in command of a company of veterans worthy of a better Captain, and to his charge had been committed a bastion, wherein were confined several State prisoners—among others the Padre Herrata.

Falcone found the priest at his devotions, kneeling upon a small window, through which could be seen a fine panorama of the valley of Mexico. Down the slope of Chapultepec to the city walls, and to the more remote lake of Tezeuco, a line of defenses extended, interspersed with gardens and groves, once the glory of this vale, which was also, in ancient times, the seat of those magnificent halls wherein the Montezumas collected their almost fabulous treasures of nature and art.

"Land of beauty and plenty," murmured the priest, as, unconscious of being overheard, he continued his prayer, "may the sins of thy unnatural children be visited not on thee! May war and violence be stayed, and—"

"A very good prayer, padre, but slightly out of season. War is here and violence not far off, I imagine."

The priest slowly rose, turning his calm eyes upon the intruder, whose voice he recognized. Padre Herrata's face was pale, and his form much thinner than before his imprisonment; for, though recovered from the wound inflicted by Falcone, he yet suffered from loss of blood and reduced strength.

"Prayer is never out of season, young man, and violence ever is," rejoined the priest, quietly.

"Reverend father, forget the past, and aid me with your good offices in disposing that dear girl whom I so fervently love to regard me with the affection I feel for her. Thus you will be the instrument of uniting two hearts, and of making me supremely happy."

The padre did not immediately reply. He seemed to be absorbed in thought, and his gaze wandered abstractedly through the barred window. At length, however, he spoke:

"I think, my son," he said, in a measured tone, "you remarked that by assisting you, I shall benefit myself. How may that be?"

"Alas!" said Falcone, to himself, "the pious fox must know his reward beforehand." Then he continued, aloud: "All that I can promise shall be yours. I will at once take measures for your release from this place, and if my purse and influence can advance you in—"

"Enough!" cried the priest, suddenly elevating his voice, and fixing his glance sternly upon the young man. "Gabriel Falcone! desperate gambler! unprincipled adventurer! do I not know that through you the unhappy brother of this maiden was hurled to his destruction? Do I not know that the pure child breathes you as the serpent whose trail has poisoned her happy youth?" Enough, Gabriel Falcone! Get thee from me!"

As Padre Herrata uttered these words, he turned away, raising his left hand with a gesture of repugnance, and expressing in his features all the horror which the retrospection of Falcone's acts was calculated to inspire. The bold young man quailed for a moment before the significant action, but he recovered himself immediately, and with features distorted by rage, advanced upon the priest.

"Cursed monk!" he hissed, savagely, "it is you, then, who have influenced her. But I will have a reckoning from you. The next time my shot will not miss!"

"Saying this, Gabriel Falcone shook his clenched hand at the calm face of the padre, and, with a fierce oath, turned toward the door of the cell, which he opened with a violent wrench. But an object here met his eyes which somewhat confounded him.

Standing majestically in the opening, apparently about entering, was a tall figure, clad in the uniform of a field officer. The stranger stooped his lofty head beneath the stone arch, and passing Falcone without a word, advanced quickly toward the priest, whose figure was distinctly visible in the light of the window.

"Padre Herrata!"

"Anselmo, my noble son! Art thou returned indeed?"

"Truly, my father. 'Tis but a brief space since arriving here I learned of your incarceration. But that is ended."

He embraced the priest affectionately in saying this.

"I shall be glad to know what all this means," here interrupted Captain Falcone, who, regaining his assurance, confronted the stranger. "As I have the honor to command in this quarter of the hill, I demand, sir, by what right—"

"Ah, sir, you shall know my right to be here," returned Colonel Montagnone, with chilling politeness. "You will, perhaps, respect the signature of your commander. Here, then, is authority for my presence, and for the release of my friend, Padre Herrata."

The speaker drew a paper from his bosom, and extended it to the other, who cast his eyes over it. It was an order, signed by General Bravo, directing the instant release of the priest, and commanding Captain Falcone to report himself instantly at head-quarters. The young officer turned pale and regarding Montagnone with a savage look, turned on his heel and left the cell without a word, but not to report himself to his commander. Fearful of consequences he knew not what, and feeling himself humiliated as well as thwarted by the new adversary he had found, the gamester mounted his horse, and galloped at once from the hill of Chapultepec.

And Gabriel Falcone, much to his chagrin, during the same morning, found himself abruptly ordered to report himself for active service at once, with a marching division of the army. So Gabriel Falcone was once more thwarted.

CHAPTER XVI.

DON RICARDO'S PLOT.

BUT, though the younger conspirator found himself obliged to abandon for a space his darling object, that arch schemer, Don Ricardo Ramos, desisted not in his plans for the ensnarement of Teresa Ginton, till at length he succeeded, through his emissaries, in discovering the whereabouts of Colonel Montagnone, and by this means, speedily regained trace of those under the latter's protection. He ascertained, moreover, that it was the consideration of Montagnone's influence with the Commander-in-Chief, Santa Anna, which had occasioned Valpo and Teresa, together with their friendly entertainers in Murillo's valley, to remove from the latter's hacienda, then imminently threatened by the American invaders. During the rapid series of events that had marked the operations of General Santa Anna, from the breaking up of the camp at San Luis till travel through Mexico had been extremely perilous, and an attempt on the part of foreigners like Teresa Ginton and Emma Pineda to pass through a country swarming with predatory bands, could have resulted only in misadventures. Consequently, the strangers had sojourned in Murillo's valley till the capture of Vera Cruz, by the forces of General Scott, threatened a speedy assault of the inland, when the timely protection of Colonel Montagnone secured for his friends a safer retreat near the strongly fortified approaches to the capital itself. Señor Lorenzo and his wife availed themselves of the hospitality of a wealthy friend, Donna Isabella Nunez, who possessed a mansion near the lake Tezcucó, and Teresa Glinton accompanied them, under Montagnone's protection, to this new and securer abiding-place. Meantime, Alonzo Vallojo and Putnam Pomfret constituted themselves, with Lorenzo, the guardian knights of these distressed ladies.

Lucille, the creole attendant of Teresa Glinton, was, like most of her volatile race and vocation, at once a warm-hearted and attached servant, and an incorrigible coquette. While Hannibal was her fellow-domestic, she had well-nigh broken that poor fellow's heart with her vagaries, though it must be confessed her own had not been unmoved by the poor black's unlucky disappearance; nevertheless, as the little creole had been in past days, so she remained, until not a few full-blooded Mexicans, as well as many hapless Mestizoes, felt their pulses beat faster as Lucille's white teeth glistened, or her silvery laugh tinkled in their ears. Indeed, the hand-maid's besetting foible was coquettish vanity, encouraged, perhaps, by the indulgence of her gentle mistress, and the general favor in which she found herself among their hospitable entertainers. Such was Lucille—as the artful Don Ricardo Ramos had judged her to be—and therefore she was no proof against his cunning when he adroitly approached her, one morning, in the disguise of a priest, pretending to be an acquaintance of Padre Herrata, the friend of her mistress.

Lucille was, of course, glad to speak with a friend of Padre Herrata, who had gone with the army, so she said, and which Don Ricardo well knew. She was also glad to tell how beloved her mistress was, and how Señor Vallojo was a noble and handsome young gentleman, and how Señor Putnam Pomfret, the Yankee, was a grand hero, who would protect them all from the American army and every body else. On his part, the shrewd Don Ricardo talked not only of Padre Herrata's many virtues, but of Lucille's good looks and amiable manners; so that the foolish damsel was speedily carried away by his discourse. Besides, he talked her own native French, and listened to her glib tongue, replying to his questions, with an attention quite flattering to the silly one.

Another interview followed the first, during which the subtle Ramos pretended to disclose, as a great secret, that he was an old friend of the Señora Teresa's deceased mother, and well acquainted with the orphan's family history; that, moreover, the young lady was entitled to considerable property once owned by her mother in Mexico; and that, finally, he much desired to see the orphan American in possession of all her rights. The story was so artfully woven as to deceive the credulous mulatto completely. Deluded by the pretended priest's familiarity, and carried away by her anxiety to insure some great advantage to her mistress, she readily promised to do what Don Ricardo desired, and procure an interview for him with the Señora Teresa.

The looked-for opportunity occurred soon. Señor Lorenzo, one day, accompanied his lady and Donna Isabella, their hostess, on a drive to the city; Putnam Pomfret was absent, at the same time, on matters connected with the hacienda, and Teresa remained at home, attended by Lucille—though the devoted Alonzo Vallejo was, as usual, in the vicinity of the hacienda. The maiden was occupied in her chamber, and the youth wandered near the lake borders, according to his habit, poring over some favorite author, among the rustling shadows of the grove. The long day was nearly over, and the sun disappearing behind the lofty mountains, when Lucille stole out to meet Don Ricardo, who had made himself aware, with great satisfaction, of the unprotected situation of the hacienda. The waiting-maid conducted her crafty deceiver to the cool drawing-room, with its jalousied casements overlooking the garden sweets, and half-closed with mazes of jessamine and honeysuckle. There, leaving him, she proceeded to her mistress, with the information, that a strange clergyman desired to see her.

"To see me, Lucille?" exclaimed Teresa. "Where is Señor Vallejo?"

"He is walking, with his book, by the lake side," answered the mulatto, demurely, her heart palpitating uneasily with the consciousness of acting a part.

"But, I can not see a stranger, Lucille."

"Oh, madame, he asks so earnestly! And, O ciel! I did not remember! He did know madame's dear mother, long ago." 30

As the word "mother" fell upon the orphan's ear, a deep flush, followed by sudden paleness, attested its effect upon her.

"Come, Lucille, we will go down at once. No, child; do you go at once and bring the Señor Vallejo. I will speak to the holy father, presently. Say this to him, and then seek Vallejo."

Lucille hurried to inform Don Ricardo that her mistress would presently see him; but she did not hasten, as Teresa had directed, to call the Señor Vallejo. Unhappy Lucille. She did not suspect that the wicked Don Ricardo was triumphing over her simplicity; that his satellites were already concealed in the woods skirting the road-side. Had the poor mulatto harbored a thought of danger, she would speedily have summoned a defender for her mistress.

But what sound was that which startled her suddenly? A suppressed shriek and the noise of rushing feet. Lucille stopped, listened intently, then darted toward the road which wound near the hacienda. Alas! the sight that met her eyes. Don Ricardo had cast away his priestly disguise, and was bearing Teresa in his arms, across the garden-walk, to a close carriage which stood at the very gate, its door attended by two swarthy servants. The Señora's head and face were wound about with a thick shawl, and she appeared to be quite insensible, when lifted and thrust into the vehicle. Lucille witnessed all this, and a loud, shrill scream from her pallid lips apprised the kidnapper that she did so.

"Curse that wench! She will ruin us," cried Don Ricardo, leaping into the carriage with the muffled Teresa. "Pedro, secure the mulatto; she must go with us."

In another moment Lucille's shrieks were stifled by a process similar to that which had rendered her mistress helpless. One ruffianly servant grasped her in his arms, while the other fastened a shawl around her mouth. She was then lifted into the coach, beside the fellow called Pedro, and opposite to his master and Teresa. The other servant sprang to the box, and the vehicle rolled rapidly away, into the dusky woods through which the highway conducted.

But, swift as the wheels whirled, and the carriage was borne forward, there was a swifter pursuit suddenly commenced by a man who, from the brow of a hill at nearly a quarter of a mile distance, had caught a hurried glimpse of the confusion, and heard the shriek of Lucille, as she was seized by Pedro. Putnam Pomfret, returning from his errand abroad, had reached a point of view commanding the cottage door, just in time to overlook the last incident of the abduction—that of muffling and securing the mulatto. Pomfret's first impulse was to shout for help and plunge downward through an intervening grove, upon the sharpers; but a moment's reflection satisfied him that he would not reach the scene in time for service, even if there were no armed odds against him. Changing, therefore, his resolution at once, the brave Yankee darted from the road-side, and entering the forest, bounded like a deer through its shadows, following the noise of the carriage-wheels, and directing his course to a point at which he should be able to intercept the fugitives by pursuing a shorter line than the circuitous highway. With panting chest, and ear strained to catch the sound of wheels, Pomfret thus kept on, for near a mile, when he at last found limbs of rock and rock with the horses which the driver was urging to their utmost speed.

"Lay on your string, Ingen," muttered Putnam Pomfret, exultantly, as his long legs traversed the ground with unabated speed. "I'm on your track now, you con-arned kidnappers, and by thunder, I'm a-goin' to keep it, now I tell ye."

With these words, the Yankee stretched his limbs for another hour, and, probably by the increasing gloom of the road, soon contrived, not only to reach the flying carriage, but to ensconce himself, much at his ease, upon the heavy seat-board behind him. Thus perched, with his legs drawn up to his chin, Putnam Pomfret felt the coach quiver as it was impelled along, and laughed quietly to himself, as the dusk grew into a dense fog, and the driver cracked his whip in the darkness.

"Put her through, Ingen," muttered Pomfret. "Give 'em the string. I'll bet ye a fourpence I get to town as soon as you do."

CHAPTER XVII.

TERESA IN DANGER.

WHEN Teresa Glinton regained consciousness, she found herself lying upon a couch in a strange apartment—Lucille, kneeling beside her, was chafing her hands and bathing her forehead with restoratives. Teresa sat upright and looked wildly around her.

"Lucille! Where are we?"

The mulatto placed her finger on her lips and glanced at the door.

Teresa raised her hand to her bosom.

"Where is it?—the dagger!" she asked.

"It is here, mademoiselle," answered Lucille, pointing significantly to the pearl-hilt of a small stiletto hidden within the folds of a kerchief that crossed her breast. "I will give it to you, mademoiselle—when we are alone."

Hardly had the mulatto pronounced these words, when a knock was heard at the door, and it was slowly unclosed, admitting the head of a man.

"May I enter?" said a softly modulated voice, and Teresa felt her heart suddenly stilled and her blood cease to flow; for upon the threshold of the apartment stood—Gabriel Falcone. The young man's face was pale, and his right arm rested in a sling. She felt herself in that man's power, without a hope of escape, and read the triumphant expression of his glance as it met her own. She knew that the unprincipled gamester remembered her scorn, and that he was likewise determined to avenge himself. Nevertheless, as one white hand rested on the handle of the weapon which lay hid beneath her bodice, Teresa felt that at least in one thing she was more than a match for her enemy—she feared not death.

"Señora Teresa, I come to ask pardon for all my offenses," said Falcone, with an inclination of his head. "Am I to be forgiven?"

"Forgiveness is for the repentant to expect," she replied.

"And I am truly repentant."

For an instant, as Falcone uttered these words with depressed head, a gleam of hope visited Teresa's heart; but it faded as she caught the raised eyes of the speaker fixed upon her once more, with an unmistakable expression of exultant villainy. She shuddered as those bold orbs fell upon her, and the blood rushed tumultuously to her neck and forehead.

"Do you hate me?"

"Falcone—why do you persecute me?"

"Is love, then, persecution?"

"Such love as yours is worse than hatred or persecution," exclaimed Teresa, "for it would degrade its object forever."

"Indeed?" cried Falcone, with a short laugh. "But you mistake me, perhaps. I would not degrade—I would marry you!"

"And is not marriage with one whom I must despise a degradation?" cried the undaunted girl. "Falcone! it is useless for me to attempt concealment of my feelings, for you well know that now, more than ever, I must view you with contempt."

"Sistera—beware!" cried the young man, his countenance growing dark with passion. "Pause ere you decide your course; for by all the fiends, you shall be mine!"

With this threat, spoken in a measured tone that evinced the resolute wickedness of his heart, Gabriel Falcone turned away, and without another look at Teresa or Lucille, strode from the apartment.

The poor mulatto girl, who had always felt an unaccountable terror of the gamester Falcone, now wrung her hands and passionately deplored their situation, entreating again and again pardon for the part which she had taken in the betrayal of her mistress. But Teresa, retiring to her chamber, sunk upon her knees and poured forth fervent prayers to Heaven for succor in her extremity.

"Oh, what is to be done? wretch—bad creature that I am—~~it~~ it is I who am to blame!" moaned poor Lucille, walking up and down the room as she gave vent to her thoughts, the tears, meanwhile, streaming from her eyes.

The girl passed opposite the window and gazed eagerly through the wires that barred it. Some object without apparently attracted her attention and checked the exuberance of her affliction. And, indeed, Lucille had cause both for wonder and attention; for, as she peered between the bars of thick wire, she beheld a sight that was well fitted to astonish her. The window overlooked a square court-yard, shut in by stone walls. The apartments in which Teresa was confined were situated in the third story of the building, and high above its casements rose the dull sides of the parallelogram described by the inner walls of the ancient building. As Lucille looked upward she could just distinguish the figure of a man cautiously appearing upon the very edge of the lofty opposite wall, and beckoning to her with his hand. Lucille could not see the face of this man, but a sudden feeling of joy thrilled her heart, as though he were in some manner to be connected with the deliverance of herself and mistress. She stopped not to reason with her hopes, but pressing forward against the wires, returned the motions of the figure above by waving her handkerchief. Immediately the man disappeared, and Lucille, agitated more than ever, rushed to the chamber of her mistress, and informed her of what she had witnessed. Teresa shook her head sadly.

"I fear you have seen only some idle workman on the neighboring walls."

"But, mam'selle,—if he be une courrier—surely he will inform everybody—but le monde—and we shall be rescued—free once more."

"Poor child; you forget we are in Mexico, where lawless acts are common. But let us trust in Heaven for all, Lucille!"

As Teresa said this, a noise at the window startled them, and turning quickly, they beheld the face of a man at the bars. Lucille would have screamed aloud, but her voice failing her, she sunk trembling upon a couch. Teresa, however, advanced at once to the casement. The man outside occupied a strange and perilous position. Clinging with one hand to the wires while the other grasped a rope, by the aid of which he had just descended from the roof, the bold climber lowered his head, and whispered:

"Keep up your courage, miss; Putnam Pomfret's abroad."

Teresa's heart leaped as she recognized the well-known accents of her countryman, whose face covered with dust and perspiration, she had not at first recognized. But, ere she could utter a word, Pomfret's finger was pressed to his lips, and the next instant he released his hold of the wires and disappeared, ascending the rope with the agility of a cat. But, as he left the window, the maiden fancied she heard him whisper:

"To-morrow!"

CHAPTER XVIII.

TERESA A CAPTIVE.

ALONZO VALLJO, wandering with his book by the margin of the placid lake, mused tenderly upon her whom he loved so well, and little dreamed of the strange drama that was involving Teresa Ginton. Too soon, however, for his peace, did the youth, grown weary of solitude, turn his steps toward the hacienda. Bending his steps to the jalousied entrance, and crossing the great threshold, he called on "Teresa!" but no voice called out "Alonzo!"—no light footstep answered his call. Teresa Ginton was no longer there. She had gone—vanished. No trace remained of her flight. The few domestics of the cottage were summoned, but could give no intelligence of Teresa. No one had heard the shriek, or the voice of Lucille. And Lucille, too, was gone! What terrible mystery was here!

All night, with frenzied eagerness, Valljo pursued the search. He explored the woods for miles around. He peered stealthingly, by torchlight, into the waters of the lake. He mounted his horse, and galloped wildly over the neighboring rocks. But no vestige, either of Teresa or her attendant, could be discovered.

At noon next day, after Lorenzo and the ladies had returned, Pomfret also presented himself, dusty and travel-worn. Alonzo flew to meet him, and pour out his sad tale; to which the Yankee listened quietly. Then, taking Valljo's hands within his own, and gazing kindly into his face, he said:

"Young fellow! what 'ud ye give to know whar Miss Teresy is? Keep a stiff upper lip, and all 'll come right; or my name ain't Putnam Pomfret."

Meantime, Teresa Ginton, in the silent apartments of Don Ricardo's mansion, trembled through the anxious hours at every noise that reached her ears. Enjoining upon Lucille to remain beside her and witness her death should she be able by no other means to avert the violence which she felt threatened her the maiden still clung with hope to the recollection of that one word which she had heard uttered by her countryman at the window:

"To-morrow!"

To-morrow had come, its weary minutes had been counted, its last sunbeams were now trembling on the wires that barred the casements. Still no shadow of a human form appeared upon the dull surface of the dead wall opposite, upon which her gaze, like that of Lucille, was ever steadfastly directed. Suddenly a noise was heard at the door, and a low knock.

"It is not Señor Falcone now; it is—"

"Let them enter—I am prepared!" said Teresa, calmly, but with a tremor agitating her lovely frame; and Lucille, unlocking the door, admitted Don Ricardo Ramos, who bowed low and remained upon the threshold.

"If Señora Ginton is not disinclined for a few words of conversation," began the man, with his furtive smile twitching the corners of his dark mouth.

"Speak, sir—what power have I to prevent?"

"All things in courtesy," replied Ramos, in a meaning tone of voice, as he remembered the contemptuous glance of his captive. "My friend, Gabriel Falcone, who loves you so intensely that I really fear for the poor youth's health, desires to know if, on the morrow, you will be pleased to meet a little party of friends?"

"I understand you not, sir!"

"I will endeavor to be intelligible. In a word, I have summoned a priest, who will to-morrow unite in the sweet bonds of matrimony, my friend Gabriel with my lovely guest, Señora Ginton."

"Sooner will I die!" exclaimed Teresa, passionately, as she retreated a step from Don Ricardo, her calmness for a moment forsaking her.

"Death is not so pleasant as marriage," laughed Ramos.

"You have my answer, sir!"

"I will!" cried Ramos. "What then will my friend Gabriel do?"

His eyes dwelt, as he spoke, upon Teresa's face with an expression so threatening and sinister, that the poor girl felt her heart sink within her bosom.

"You abandoned me to this wicked man! 'Tis well—I shall defend myself!" cried Teresa, calmly returning the triumphant gaze of Ramos.

But at this moment Lucille's eyes sought those of her mistress with a mounting look. The mulatto, seated near the window, had caught a sudden glimpse of a shadow appearing upon the top of the opposite wall, and her quick glance conveyed the intelligence to her mistress. At the same time, she rushed forward, and sinking on the floor beside Teresa, cried impulsively:—

"Oh, mistress! do not die! Promise the Señor—your happiness is his portion—promise! Oh, mistress! it is not tres difficile to be married—"

"Rise, Lucille—and be silent!" cried Teresa, angrily, as Don Ricardo passed and surveyed them.

"Promise, my dear mistress!" persisted the mulatto. "They will kill—they will destroy us all." Then, in a low whisper, scarcely reaching the mulatto's ear, she said humbly: "The Señor will be saved—the brave Señor is here!"

"Lucille! be silent!"

But as Teresa spoke, she sank upon a chair beside her, her delicate frame overpowered by the variety of her emotions. Don Ricardo saw, as he conjectured, the yielding of the timid woman, irrespective of her purpose.

"The good girl is right," said he, softly; "marriage is not so difficult. And—Falcon is a noble fellow if he is thwarted, you know."

Teresa raised her eyes to the speaker. Lucille, crouching at the feet of her mistress, pressed her head closely.

"But—did not Falcon say—'either—to-morrow!' the mulatto said, strongly.

"I know it, but I have not will not make him more impatient," responded Ramos, with his native smile. "Nevertheless, if you promise that he shall then be very happy—"

"I promise nothing, but that to-morrow I will receive his visit."

"But I may say a word to give the youth some hope?" said Don Ricardo, with a low laugh.

"You may say what you please," said Teresa, coldly, as she rose, and turned with Lucille toward the inner chamber.

Ramos left the apartment, and Lucille hastened to re-fasten the door. At the instant, a folded slip of paper glided between the window-wires, and fell upon the floor. Teresa seized it and read it aloud with a beating heart:

"Be of good courage, Teresa. We will come for you to-morrow. ALONZO."

"Oh, Father in heaven, I thank thee!" cried the orphan, sinking on her knees, and devoutly clasping her hands, while Lucille ran to the casement wild with joy.

But Pomfret was not to be seen. Evidently aware of the presence of Don Ricardo in the chamber, he had watched the latter's departure for an opportunity to introduce the slip of paper. This accomplished, he had retraced at once his perilous way over the walls of the adjoining house. In the meantime, Don Ricardo Ramos, after leaving the presence of his anticipated victim, proceeded to another room, where Gabriel Falcone, extended upon a couch, lay awaiting his coming. The triumphant expression of the elder villain's face was noticed immediately by the gamester.

"She consents?" he cried.

"To see you to-morrow. Doubtless to reveal her long-concealed love—"

"Pish! but the marriage—"

"I am about to notify a priest of my acquaintance that he be on hand to-morrow," returned Don Ricardo. "So, my dear Gabriel, I desire you to keep quiet, and not irritate that wound of yours, which must be a painful one, though the bullet is not there."

"No, the bullet is not lost, thank fortune!" said Falcone.

"I can assure that it is not so pleasant to carry such a companion about with you," asked Don Ricardo, with his sardonic smile, as at that moment he experienced a twinge of pain occasioned by the ball which lay imbedded in his groin, and had always defied extraction, save at the risk of life.

Gabriel Falcone knew that his father's skill had left a lasting monument with Don Ricardo Ramos.

With slow and dignified steps, Don Ricardo took his way to a religious house belonging to one of the various orders of monks established in the city, and, inquiring for a member of the fraternity, was ushered into the refectory, where he encountered Fray Pedro, the priest who had officiated at the funeral of Don Tasso, the uncle of Valjo. The worthy monk was engaged in writing at a small deal table, for he exercised the duties of a clerk in the monastery to which he was attached. At his feet crouched a large dog, which growled sullenly as Don Ricardo entered the room.

"Down, Beppo! you are unmannerly!" giving the animal a light tap on his head. "God be with you, Don Ricardo—approach; the dog is harmless."

"His looks belie him most confidently, then, worthy Fray Pedro," answered Ramos, pausing irresolutely as the dog rose up, displaying a row of formidable teeth, seemed prepared to dispute the visitor's advance.

"Oh, Beppo, out! Indeed, he is quite unused to behave thus to visitors," apologized the friar, driving the dog beneath the table, where he crouched, sullenly regarding Don Ricardo with glittering eyes, and emitting now and then a low growl, not at all calculated to allay the new-comer's apprehensions.

"You should shoot such a vicious beast—hang, or at least drown him, Fray Pedro," cried Don Ricardo, taking a chair near the priest, so as to interpose the latter's person between himself and the animal.

"The dog has many good qualities, and is attached to me," answered the priest. "Poor fellow! I found him half-starved, wallowing by a grave, where, doubtless, his former master was buried. He is a great protection to me, I assure you, as I walk the streets during these troubled times."

Don Ricardo failed to encourage the garrulosity of the good priest concerning the merits of an animal that found very little favor with himself; so, hastily changing the conversation, he said:

"I speak to you some time since concerning a ceremony—a marriage—that I desired performed at my house. Your services will be required to-morrow."

"At your house, my son?"

"At my house the parties are now residing; and, as in these unnatural times there is nothing certain but danger and death, I wish my young friends to be well-lodged and away from Mexico as speedily as possible. To-morrow at noonday, Fray Pedro, is the hour appointed."

"I will come, Don Ricardo," was the priest's answer, followed by a short snarl from his dog.

"Your canine friend seems no friend of mine," remarked Ramos, with his bitter laugh, as he walked to the door. "But, remember, worthy father, at noonday, to-morrow."

CHAPTER XIX.

THE PLOT DEFEATED.

PUNCTUALLY as the bell announced the hour of noon upon the following day, Fray Pedro presented himself at the great door of Don Ricardo's mansion. Behind him followed the burly dog Beppo, and scarcely had the dark-featured porter opened a passage, when the animal, with a loud bark, rushed into the hall and bounded up the wide staircase. His pious master was shocked with the unwonted behavior of his favorite, and the servant of that restless mansion grew absolutely horrified as the bay of Beppo rung through the passages. At this moment Don Ricardo Ramos emerged from a door which he opened at the head of the stairs, and immediately found himself thrown to the floor by an instant rush of the dog, as the latter, dashing between his legs, darted to the interior of the house.

"That infernal brute here!" cried the enraged Ramos, as the servant ran to his assistance, and the alarmed priest ascended the staircase, breathing heavily in his efforts to make haste. "What in the devil's name, Fray Pedro, do you mean by bringing such a ferocious monster to my house?"

But the poor priest was too much spent with fatigue and anxiety to answer at once, and heaving the bark of Beppo from the inner precincts of the mansion, sounded loud and joyfully. Don Ricardo hurried through the passages, and Fray Pedro followed him as fast as he best might.

Through dark passages seemed interminable to the weary friar, but at length his companion reached the door of an apartment within which the dog's bark was heard, no longer violent, but apparently full of joy. A moment after, the owner of the house had led the way into a large chamber, where a singular spectacle met his follower's eyes.

The apartment was hung with tapestry and lit by waxen candles, burning in heavy silver candle-ticks at different corners of the room. No light entered from without, for thick curtains effectually concealed the windows.

The dog, Beppo lay at the feet of a beautiful girl who caressed the animal, while he in turn licked her white hand and hid his huge head in her lap. Behind this maiden stood a younger girl, half-dressed, to add her caresses to the noble dog. A few paces from both stood a young man, whose right arm was pinned to his breast by a silken scarf, while his left hand rested upon a table covered with materials for writing.

"Your dog has made friends at last, good friar," said Don Ricardo, with a harsh laugh. "How read you this?"

"The animal may remember old friends," replied the priest, sensitively, looking toward Teresa, who said, quietly:

"The dog was my poor brother's—alas!"

At once, as the maiden uttered these words, Fray Pedro recalled her features and recalled the occasion when he had last beheld them. An expression of wonder was visible in his countenance, and he was about to draw near to Teresa, when the voice of Don Ricardo abruptly pronounced his name.

"Fray Pedro, you are to unite these young people in matrimony," said the latter, motioning to Falcone, who approached the arm-chair. Teresa half rose and placed her hand to her bosom. There was still concealed the poison which she regarded as her resort in the extremity of danger. Lucille glided round and stood beside her mistress, and the dog, as if conscious that danger threatened the sister of his lost master, growled low before them with an ominous growl.

Teresa Clinton saw that the crisis of her fate was approaching. She gave up all hopes of rescue by her friends, and hesitated only as to whether she should make one last appeal, invoking the priest to aid her, ere she should defy her persecutors, and, like her lost brother, rush uncalled to the presence of God. It was a terrible alternative; for the maiden believed that Fray Pedro was a ready instrument of her cruel captors, and feared that to implore his assistance would be lost to accelerate her doom. Already the priest had taken her hand in one of his own, extending the other to Falcone.

"The names?" said Fray Pedro, looking to Don Ricardo.

"Gabriel Falcone and Teresa Ginton."

The priest stood a moment as if paralyzed with astonishment—then dropped his hands beside him—then clasped them violently together, while his eyes wandered from one to the other of those he had been about to unite. A sudden recollection was flashing through his brain—he fell suddenly back, an expression of horror agitating his features.

"I can not perform the ceremony," he gasped. "I can not commit a mortal sin—"

"Priest, have a care," cried Ramos, in a threatening voice.

The friar shrunk away, trembling before the aspect of the speaker, and, half-mechanically, murmured:

"I can not marry them—they are the children of—"

"Of one mother!" he was about to conclude, but ere the words were spoken, his throat was violently grasped by Ramos, and he staggered back against the wall of the apartment. Gabriel Falcone, unaware that a strange disclosure was thus suddenly checked, stood in blank surprise, while Teresa's heart sunk at this new scene of violence. But another actor promptly interposed. The huge dog sprung from the floor, and at one bound reached the bosom of Fray Pedro's assailant.

"Help! Falcone! help!" cried Don Ricardo, as he felt the dog's teeth meet in his flesh, while the double weight bore him against the friar, who, struggling for life, had wound his fingers in his assailant's long hair.

The young man drew a dagger with his left hand, and, rushing forward, plunged the weapon into Beppo's breast. But he had as well wounded a lion. The pain of the stab only increased the animal's rage, and in an instant more he had turned upon Falcone, while Don Ricardo, released from his peril, lifted his own dagger against the now exhausted priest.

At this crisis a sudden crash was heard, and a burst of sunlight streamed into the apartment from a wide rent in one of the velvet curtains which had hidden the casements. Teresa and Lucille looked up and beheld the stalwart form of Putnam Pennington. He stood with one foot extended within the doorway, while his right hand clung to the casement-frame which he had just wrenched asunder. But he was not alone; beside him, upon the stone parapet, stood Colonel Montagnone, Vallega, and Lorenzo.

The burst of joy with which Teresa Glinton recognized her lover was mingled with the report of a pistol discharged by that lover's hand. Alanzo, with the same glance that encountered his mistress, beheld likewise the imminent peril of his uncle's friend, Fray Pedro. Quick as thought he fired at Don Ricardo, whose dark features he had instantly recalled, and ere the smoke had cleared away, the villain had released his grasp of the priest and fallen heavily to the floor. All transpired in the space of a moment; nevertheless, this brief space had sufficed for the fierce dog to drive Falcone to a corner of the apartment, where, sheltering himself behind a piece of heavy furniture, he defended himself with his dagger which was his only weapon.

Vallega, meanwhile, assisted Fray Pedro to a chair, for the poor priest was nearly exhausted with his struggle, and then turning to Teresa clasped her in his arms, while Montagnone intervened to rescue Gabriel Falcone from his canine assailant. The splendid dog, however, seemed at once to recognize the defeat of his enemies, for with a low growl, in token of triumph, he walked to the chair in which Fray Pedro reclined, and crawled at his feet, quietly licking the wound which Falcone had inflicted, while his large eyes watched the withering form of Don Ricardo, who was vainly striving to rise.

"Curse!" muttered the wretched Ricardo. "Maledictions upon all priests!"

"Unhappy man! you will yourself soon need a priest," said Montagnone, approaching and stooping beside Don Ricardo.

"The hour is near!"

"I can see. Where's Falcone—dead? Has he fled? Ha! Ha! Where is his wife? his sister? Oh, curse that priest for slaying him!"

The tortured villain essayed to uplift his hand which still clutched the dagger with which he would have slain Fray Pedro; but the effort only forced the blood from his mouth.

"Maledictions on all of ye! Why did I meddle with the sacrament, and thus lose all? Falcone!—ha!—you should have had your will—brother and sister! ha! ha! ha!"

And with the chuckling laugh which was natural to him, Don Ricardo fell back to the floor, his eyes closing suddenly.

"He is dead!" gasped Fray Pedro, with pallid lips, as Vallego and Teresa drew near. "And without confession."

"Confession—ha!" cried the sneering voice of Ramos, his eyes unclenching with a sinister glance on all around him; "yes, priest, let me confess. I would have married them—don't fear me, Fray Pedro? Their mother scorned and slighted me—his father branded and dishonored me. It was my revenge—hark ye, priest—to give the sacrament to both—brother and sister—ha! what think you? Have I not confessed?"

Again that strange laugh rung through the apartment—again the eyes closed, and this time forever. Don Ricardo Ramos had gone to his account.

Gabriel Falcone—his bold eyes sunk, his cheeks pallid as those of a corpse—had listened to the incoherent words of him who had lured him step by step to ruin. The wretched young man's glance now caught the half-averted gaze of Teresa Ginton—the child of his mother. And Charles Ginton, too, was the child of Maria Minas. Gabriel Falcone! a brother's blood is on thy head, for, but for thee, Ginton were now alive and happy!

This horrible thought burned like a flame in the heart of the gamester. He cast one despairing look around him, and then, spurning the dead form of Ramos with his foot, fled precipitately from the apartment. No one followed him!

"Let the critter go!" cried Putnam Pomfret. "He's got a coal o' fire burnin' in his heart that's a nation sight wuss than hangin' or shootin', now I tell ye."

And Alonzo Vallego, clasping Teresa to his bosom, murmured, as if in prayer: "Oh my uncle! my childhood's friend! Look down and smile upon the daughter of your beloved—the child of Maria Minas!"

THE END.

BEADLE'S DIME BIOGRAPHICAL LIBRARY

One Hundred Pages Complete.

No. 1—LIFE OF GARIBALDI, the Liberator of Italy. By O. J. VICTOR, author of lives of "Scott," "Wayne," etc.

The wonderful career of Garibaldi reads like a wild romance. No man ever lived who has performed such prodigies of valor, or who has had a more varied fortune. Mr. Victor has produced the only authentic life of the man yet given. It is written in a style calculated to enchain attention from first to last.

No. 2—LIFE OF DANIEL BOONE, the Hunter of Kentucky. By E. S. ELLIS, author of lives of "Pontiac," "Kit Carson," "Crockett," etc.

A stirring and thoroughly romantic narrative, by one who has won a permanent place in our literature as a delineator of Border and Indian life and History. The work embodies, beside the life of Boone, narratives of the defeat of St. Clair, of the adventures of Simon Kenton, McClernand and others.

No. 3—LIFE OF KIT CARSON, the Rocky Mountain Scout and Guide. By E. S. ELLIS, author of lives of "Tecumseh," "Kit Carson," etc.

The celebrated "Kit" is here daguerretyped in a biography of exciting nature. His long "tramps," his wild life on the prairies, his terrible experiences and sufferings as Explorer and Guide, his "rancho" home—all conspire to render his story one of peculiar and thrilling interest.

No. 4—LIFE OF ANTHONY WAYNE, the Revolutionary Patriot and Hero of Two Wars. By O. J. VICTOR, author of life of "Garibaldi," etc.

Old "Mad Anthony" is a noble historical character. He is, literally, one of the Fathers of the Republic. Mr. Victor has painted his sturdy character in truthful colors, and produces a book which possesses a perpetual interest for those who love their country and its brave defenders.

No. 5—LIFE AND ADVENTURES OF DAVID CROCKETT. By E. S. ELLIS, author of lives of "Boone," "Kit Carson," "Pontiac," etc.

The immortal Colonel Crockett has a name and fame perennial. He certainly was one of the most remarkable men this continent has produced. At once, citizen, statesman, hunter and warrior, his career was one wilder than that of any hero of romance. Mr. Ellis has essayed to paint the man as he was—to tell the story of his deeds as fully and correctly as possible. The biography is, hence, very complete.

No. 6—LIFE OF WINFIELD SCOTT, embracing his Military and Civil Services. By O. J. VICTOR, author of lives of "Garibaldi," "Wayne," etc.

Alexander Humboldt, after carefully studying every move in the Mexican campaign, pronounced Scott the greatest general of modern times. In great Britain he is regarded as the equal of the Duke of Wellington in all the high qualities of command and strategy. Let the youth of our land read it for its lessons of courage, faith, patriotism and integrity.

No. 7—LIFE OF PONTIAC THE CONSPIRATOR, and the Siege of Detroit. By E. S. ELLIS, author lives of "Tecumseh," "Kit Carson," etc.

Pontiac was a very remarkable character. His life was devoted to his one great desire of sweeping the entire white race from the continent. His matchless eloquence filled the land with the terror of his name. His prowess stirred savage hearts from the Northern Lakes to the Everglades of Florida. All persons interested in our early history, and in the life of one of the most remarkable of Chiefs, should not fail to procure the book.

No. 8—LIFE EXPLORATIONS AND ADVENTURES OF JOHN CHAS. FREMONT, the American Pathfinder.

Here is a book at once biography and the romance of biography. It tells the story of Fremont's adventurous life in a connected narrative, which can not fail to interest every lover of the novel and exciting life in the "Far West" in the American continent. The most remarkable experiences of Fremont in his several exploring expeditions, under the guidance of the celebrated Kit Carson, are all detailed at length.

No. 9—LIFE OF JOHN PAUL JONES embracing a full account of Services in the American, French and Russian Navies. By O. J. Victor. Paul Jones is one of the most remarkable characters in American history. He was the terror of privateers and himself the most successful privateer of the Revolution. His story is one series of remarkable ventures, which serve to illustrate not only his daring but also show what a man can do when he makes up his mind never to surrender. This biography has been prepared with great care. It differs, in essential particulars from Cooper and Mackenzie's biographies, and gives, in considerable length, the story of Jones' service in the Russian navy. Together it is a very novel and desirable book.

No. 10—LIFE OF THE MARQUIS LAFAYETTE, the Friend of Liberty. By E. P. Hollister.

So much interest centers around the name of Lafayette that the story of his life is a theme of never ending pleasure. A foreigner, a noble of most ancient descent, with vast estates at his command, his ardent worship of liberty led him to our shores, to become the intimate friend of Washington. In no small degree he served to comfort and sustain "Father of his Country," in his times of severest trial. The part he played in the council was an important one, while his deeds of valor lend a new charm of a chivalrous bravery to his list of eminent virtues.

No. 11—LIFE AND EXPLOITS OF TECUMSEH, the Shawnee Chief.

By E. S. Ellis, author of lives of "Pontiac," Boone, "Crockett,"

This biography of the renowned Indian warrior and coadjutor of the British is among the best ever prepared of its subject. The record of long journeys from the north to the south, of his wild harangues, of wonderful exhibitions of personal prowess, of his many battles, reads like an Arabian Night's Tale. The work embraces also biographical notices of Black Hoof, Captain Logan, Cornstalk, Little Turtle, Tarhe ("Crane,") Keokuk, and other celebrated Shawnee Chiefs.

No. 12—LIFE OF MAJOR-GENERAL GEORGE B. McCLELLAN, late General in Chief U. S. A.

Comprising his services in Mexico, on the Red River Exploration Expedition, on the Pacific Railway Survey and Exploration in Northern Arizona, on the Army Commission to Europe, etc., together with a complete history of the campaign in Western Virginia. This biography will be found to answer the demand for the story of his life. It is the only biography of the man worthy of the name.

No. 13—PARSON BROWNLOW, and the Unionists of East Tennessee. With a sketch of his Life.

Comprising the story of the experiences and sufferings of the Unionists of East Tennessee; the Parson's remarkable adventures; incidents of prison-life of himself and coadjutors; anecdotes of his daughter; Editorials of the Knoxville Whig; together with an interesting account of Buell's occupation of Tennessee. The version of the Parson's sufferings and experiences here given will be found as startling as a romance. It is in no respects, a transcript of the book written by Brownlow, but contains much matter not included in that work. To those who wish for a thrilling story of human wrongs, sufferings and devotion to principle, this little book especially commends itself.

No. 14—ABRAHAM LINCOLN. Pioneer's Son, Hunter, Farmer's 'Haw', Self-Educated Student, Successful Lawyer, Congressman, and President of the United States. By O. J. Victor.

This biography is a straight-forward and careful history of one of the most remarkable lives of this or any other generation. It presents varied experiences fully, and traces his development with reference imparting, not only a complete biography of the man, but also a lesson to the young men of America, by which they may learn how true greatness can come forth even from the lowly log-cabin of the humble farmer to adorn the highest and most august stations in public life.
